4. Apart from what may be described as these operative passages, Secretary Lovett's letter had a paragraph dealing with the "Consultations" in which, while endorsing the idea of frequent discussions of world conditions and particularly those which might give rise to general war, he cautioned the State Department that they should not undertake to provide the Canadian or any other Government with specific information relating to how and when atomic weapons might be used. Since the State Department itself have been very emphatic in excluding this subject from the purview of the "Consultations", this caution seems unnecessary.

5. Ignatieff in his conversation with Arneson said that he was unable to offer any official comment on this letter since official reaction would have to come from Ottawa. He did observe, however, that the letter particularly in relation to "intransit flights not involving strikes" did not seem to correspond to the categories which are deemed from the Canadian standpoint to have "important political significance" as set out in your message to Matthews contained in Wiser No. 6 of August 16th. He reserved the Canadian position generally and suggested that if proposals in the terms of Secretary Lovett's letter were to go forward unchanged to the Canadian Government, it would be probable that the Canadian Government would have to suggest substantial changes before agreement could be reached. It was therefore proposed and agreed that comment would be sought as soon as possible from Ottawa to enable the State Department to provide the Department of Defense with some preliminary Canadian reaction, and that thereafter an effort should be made as soon as possible to arrive at an understanding of the arrangements in writing which would be acceptable to the U.S. Government and to the Canadian Government, to be recorded in a letter from the State Department to myself.

6. As far as my preliminary reaction is concerned, the main difficulty seems to arise in the efforts of the Defense Department in "clarifying" arrangements concerned with "intransit flights not involving strikes". The letter, which I understand was drafted by General Walsh, suggests that as a result of Service-to-Service talks the Canadian Government might be prepared to grant a blanket authorization for all such activities. Such "intransit flights" would not only include such routine operations as overflight exercises or the rotation of non-nuclear components located at bases abroad, but would presumably include all preparatory deployments of nuclear and non-nuclear components involving flights over Canada and stops at bases in Canadian territory. Liberally interpreted by the U.S. authorities it would presumably cover in effect the use of Canadian territory for ferrying weapons to advance bases overseas without the specific concurrence of the Canadian Government until the point is reached where actual strike operations involving Canadian bases or Canadian air-space are necessary. I find it difficult to believe that such SAC operations would be regarded by any Canadian Government as being devoid of "important political significance".

7. The second possible objection relates to arrangements concerned with "deployment to Canadian bases in preparation for a strike". This activity would include the storage of unassembled atomic weapons in Canadian territory. The Department of Defense appears to be sanguine that the Canadian Government might be willing to give "prior blanket authorization" for the carrying out of such operations subject to "prior notification procedure". In this case the Department of Defense does not seem to have interpreted any Service-to-Service talks as indicating a willingness on our part to agree to such an arrangement. However, clarification of our views is evidently desirable on this point if we are not to become involved in rather profitless "conversations at a political level". A satisfactory aspect of the letter is the unequivocal recognition that "prior approval" of the Canadian Government through "Government-to-Government channels" is required in regard to any strikes from Canadian bases or overflight of Canadian territory on strike operations. The rider attached to this understanding that "thereafter the procedure should be on the basis of Service-to-Service notification" presumably means that such operations would only be undertaken in the event of war and that the Canadian Government's initial consent would amount to an agreement to enter into hostilities.

8. It would also be necessary to take a very careful look at the language in the first paragraph of the passages quoted above. The reference to the arrangements discussed being "ex-NATO" might mean that the U.S. authorities have in mind making requests of the Canadian Government related to emergencies which might arise outside the territory defined in the North Atlantic Treaty. This will evidently require clarification.

9. While this whole subject it is understood should be kept out of P.J.B.D. channels, it is evident that McNaughton and Henry have already been involved in some degree in these matters, and I think therefore it would be desirable to have some guidance before the P.J.B.D. meeting next week. In any case I think it is desirable that some reaction should be forthcoming on our side before the Defense Department becomes too fixed in its apparently optimistic interpretation of the results of the talks so far held through Service channels in defining what we would regard as requests having important political significance and otherwise. Ends.

PROCEDURE FOR HANDLING URGENT U.S. REQUESTS — DISTINCTION BETWEEN FLIGHTS OF POLITICAL SIGNIFICANCE AND OTHERS

Following for Wrong from Heeney, Begins: We have now had some opportunity to consider the information given in your message, and have reached tentative conclusions concerning our course of action. It is the purpose of this message to outline what we think might be done, and to ask for your comments.

2. As Ignatieff suggested to Arneson, we would not (not) wish to receive formal proposals in the terms of Mr. Lovett's letter. Presumably our "preliminary reactions" as they may be given to the State Department will be incorporated in a reply from Mr. Arneson. Before any formal communication is made to the State Department, there are certain points which we think you should raise informally with Arneson. Upon some of these points we will have the authority of the Prime Minister before taking any position, but we do not (not) wish to make recommendations to him without (without) first consulting you. We are outlining below, therefore, the line which we are disposed to recommend to the Prime Minister as a basis for your approach to the State Department. Immediately we receive your comments we will seek Mr. St. Laurent's authority to instruct you.

3. We would propose to put the problem to the Prime Minister in terms of the three categories of flights listed in Lovett's letter and quoted in your paragraph 3. We are inclined to consider all three of these categories as including flights of "political significance" in the sense of our previous discussions. We are not (not) aware of having indicated that the Government is prepared to grant a "blanket authorization", subject only to notification, for flights in any of these categories. After re-examining the problem, however, we are now prepared to recommend that the Government grant a "blanket authorization" for flights in category A, namely "in transit" flights not (not) involving strikes, to areas outside of Canadian territory. This "blanket authorization" would not (not), of course, cover the movement of assembled bombs, for which Government authorization would be required in each case, but only the movement of nuclear components or "containers" in a condition where they could not (not) be detonated. Such authorization would be subject to a mutually satisfactory procedure for prior notification on a service level.

4. A point of some importance would arise concerning the term "mutually satisfactory" in relation to the notification procedure. We should not (not) wish the notification merely to relate to flight clearances for individual aircraft. We think we would be given the maximum information of possible political significance in relation to the operations being undertaken. We realize that it is probably unlikely that the Defence Department would be willing to tell us, in connection with any particular series of flights, exactly how may special weapons were to be moved or exactly where they would be deployed. Nevertheless, we should wish to have some general information on these points. A satisfactory notification procedure would involve a general statement of the programme contemplated, such as was given in your Wiser Telegram No. 10 of September 1.† In connection with the recent series of flights to the U.K. beyond such a statement we should require only the service level flight clearances which are usual for other USAF operations, except that we should expect to be informed of any significant changes in the programme.

5. We consider that you should be instructed to explain to the State Department this position concerning flights in category A making it clear that this is a new position as far as the Canadian Government is concerned. You should then go on to discuss categories B and C.

6. The provisions of Lovett's letter applying to category C appear entirely satisfactory to us. We should be happy to see them put in writing in a letter from the State Department to yourself (as suggested in your paragraph 5), together with the new understanding to which I have referred concerning category A.

7. The most difficult problem arises in connection with category B. It seems clear that Lovett thinks that completely satisfactory arrangements for category A merely require formal confirmation, and that the same arrangement should be made for category B. It is our view that flights in category B are of such potential political significance that we could not (not) agree to a procedure such as has been proposed by Lovett for category A. In general we would wish to have as much time as possible in which to assess the factors in the situation which might lead the U.S. Government to a decision either to launch an atomic attack or to deploy atomic weapons in preparation for such an attack, although we recognize that time might not (not) always permit this. Obviously we would like to have such information in relation to any possible atomic attack, whether involving Canadian facilities or not (not), and we hope that the special consultations will serve to keep us informed on this subject. Any such attack, however, for which Canadian facilities might be used would be of special political importance to Canada, and, for such an attack, it would be imperative that we should have the fullest possible account of the circumstances necessitating it. In this context, we regard deployment on Canadian territory as of importance, because we would expect that it might be carried out long enough in advance of any actual strike for us to [be] brought fully into the picture. A request for permission to launch strikes from or through Canadian territory might be so urgent that no (no) time would be given us for weighing ourselves the issues involved. On the other hand, the urgency would not (not) likely be so great in a case of advance deployment. Indeed, we are inclined to regard both deployment in preparation for a possible strike and the actual launching of a strike as likely to be of almost equivalent political importance. The chief distinction between the two is the probable time factor involved.

8. In proposing that the permission of the Canadian Government should be obtained prior to the deployment of atomic weapons on Canadian territory, we should not (not) necessarily insist upon Government consideration of each individual flight. We would suggest that an agreement be reached concerning flights of this type under which the Canadian Government might be asked to approve some general deployment operation. Under such an arrangement, individual flights and associated movements within such a general programme might be undertaken subject to notification on a service level and on the understanding that the Canadian Government would be consulted concerning any substantial subsequent modification of the general programme.

9. In summary, we propose to recommend to the Prime Minister that you be authorized to inform the State Department:

(1) That the government is prepared to give "blanket authorization" for "in transit" flights to areas outside of Canadian territory, subject to agreement upon a satisfactory notification procedure and on the condition that no (no) assembled atomic weapons be carried without (without) the explicit approval of the Government.

(2) That the Government is not (not) willing to grant similar blanket authorization for atomic strikes from or over Canadian territory, or for deployment of atomic weapons on Canadian territory.

(3) That the Government would agree to an arrangement under which it might grant prior approval for a general programme of deployment of atomic weapons on Canadian territory on the understanding that individual flights and related operations in the context of the approved programme could be carried out subject only to normal flight clearances as long as the approved programme was not significantly changed.

11. We should be grateful for your comments. Ends. Message Ends.

Following for Reid from Wrong, Begins: Heeney's Wiser No. 15 of November 15th. Procedure for Handling U.S. Requests.

1. I agree that all three categories of flights listed in Lovett's letter to Acheson include flights of political significance. I have some doubts whether we should go as far as the proposal summarized in paragraph 9(1) of the message under reference, but I agree with the proposals in paragraph 9(2) and (3).

2. I suggest that before consulting the Prime Minister you should seek an opinion from the RCAF on the probability of any strikes with atomic weapons being made in the event of war from Canadian bases or through Canadian airspace. My impression is that intercontinental bombing is no longer considered a practical possibility because of the vulnerability of unescorted B.36's and B.29's to attack by Russian jet fighters. Indeed, in Korea escorted flights of B.29's have proved too costly to be continued in daytime. It seems to me unlikely therefore that any flights falling within Category (c) of Lovett's letter would take place at least until new carriers for atomic weapons have been developed of very long range and very high speed. You might consult Solandt as well as the RCAF on this point.

3. In practice therefore our national political interests will probably for some years have to be safeguarded through procedures devised under Categories (a) and (b). In this connection mention of the domestic procedures adopted by the U.S. Government is not irrelevant. As previously reported, the release from the custody of the Atomic Energy Commission to the Strategic Air Command of both containers and nuclear components for atomic weapons requires the personal authorization of the President, given after consultation with the Secretaries of State and Defense and the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission. Similar consent is required for the deployment by SAC outside the United States of the bombs and also of their nuclear cores. (It is unlikely that except on actual strikes any flights by SAC would be made with fully assembled bombs.) This indicates that the political significance of the movement of atomic weapons is recognized at all stages by U.S. Government practice, although they are asking us to recognize that several types of flight involving Canadian territory do not have political significance.

4. While I think that we should agree to some modification of our present arrangements and to a greater use of the Service-to-Service channel, we must be careful not to go too far. It should, I think, be established clearly what channel is to be used between the Services, and I would prefer that this should be from Chief of Air Staff to Chief of Air Staff. I presume that instructions could be given to the C.A.S. in Ottawa that he can only reply to such requests after consultation with the Minister of National Defence, who would himself normally consult the Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs. Furthermore, we might insist that whenever the Service channel is used in this connection a minimum notice of at least forty-eight hours must be given, in addition to the provision through this channel of information of the sort outlined in your paragraph 7.[35]

5. Another point is that in paragraph 3 you refer to the movement of containers "in a condition where they could not be detonated". You will remember the explosion over the St. Lawrence River a couple of years ago of a container which had to

[35] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
(+ all nuclear component deployments should be cleared.) G[eorge] I[gnatieff] be jettisoned. My impression is that containers carried on flights in Categories (a) and (b) can always be detonated because of the importance of the destruction of the bomb if the aircraft gets into difficulty.

6. You make no mention of the first quoted paragraph of Lovett's letter, which refers to these arrangements being "ex-NATO". I think this point needs clarification also. It is my understanding that through the approval of the strategic concept governing NATO military plans, the Canadian Government assumed an obligation to assist the United States in carrying out its responsibilities for the strategic air offensive. No such obligation can be said to exist in relation to responsibilities which the United States has assumed or may assume outside the NATO area.

7. I think that we should not reply at once to the proposals of the Department of Defense. We might suggest that the State Department should now only acknowledge Lovett's letter and say that it is under discussion with the Canadian Government. Arneson is now in Paris, but we could tell Chase, his Deputy, that because of the absence of some of the Ministers concerned in Europe it will take us a little time to formulate the views of the Canadian Government.

8. Another reason for delay is that the British have not got as far as we have in making specific arrangements covering the U.S. bases in England, and that this is almost certain to be a matter which Mr. Churchill will take up when he visits Washington in January. I am reporting separately on the state of the British discussions on this subject. Ends.

1. Chase (Arneson's Assistant) has told us that it would be helpful if we could inform him definitely that there would be some delay before we would be able to comment on the proposals of the Department of Defense reported in my Wiser No. 14 of November 8th, giving as the reason the absence of senior Ministers concerned in Europe on U.N. and NATO business. He would then be able to prepare an acknowledgement of the letter from the Secretary of Defense, saying that its contents had been taken up with the Canadian authorities but that consideration of the proposals would have to await the return to Ottawa of the Ministers in question.

2. I have a further suggestion to make on the substance of these proposals for consideration in Ottawa. It arises out of a discussion with the British Embassy. As I think you know, no nuclear components for atomic weapons have so far been transferred from the custody of the Atomic Energy Commission to the U.S. Air Force for transfer abroad. We might consider whether all flights involving the deployment of the nuclear cores of weapons either to Canadian bases or through Canadian airspace should be regarded as having political significance. If this were acceptable here, it should make it easier to agree to a considerable relaxation of the present procedure governing the deployment of weapons without the nuclear cores, since such weapons cannot, of course, be used until they are completely assembled. Reference your Wiser No. 18 of November 23.

Following for Wrong from Reid, Begins: We approve your proposal to inform Chase that, as the senior ministers concerned are at present in Europe, there will be some delay before we can comment on the proposals of the Department of Defense reported in your Wiser No. 14 of November 8. For your own information, we are handicapped by the absence from Ottawa not (not) only of Mr. Pearson and Mr. Claxton, but of Heeney and MacKay in our own Department, Soland and Foulkes in National Defence. I am a little hesitant to discuss the question with Curtis in the absence of Foulkes; up to this time Curtis has not been brought into the subject as far as we are aware, in spite of the fact that, in a limited sense, Miller was given information on it for the PJBD meeting conversations in August. We shall, therefore, be more than happy to let the matter rest until the return of the party at present at Rome.[36]

2. The suggestion in your paragraph 2, relating to a possible differentiation between the movement of nuclear cores and of weapons lacking nuclear cores is interesting. It is my impression that this possibility was examined some time ago and was not considered particularly useful in relation to the development of the negotiations to that point, but we shall re-examine this matter while awaiting the return of the various people I have mentioned. On preliminary consideration, it seems to me that this distinction might be much more useful now that the various US authorities (i.e. both State Department and Defense Department) are apparently willing to commit themselves explicitly to obtain the approval of the Canadian Government in certain specific cases. Message ends.

PROCEDURES SUGGESTED BY THE UNITED STATES AND RELATED QUESTIONS

1. Mr. Ignatieff on November 26th informed Mr. Chase of the State Department that there would be some delay before Canadian comments could be offered on the proposals of the Department of Defense, submitted to you in my message Wiser No. 14 of November 8th, because of the absence in Europe of several of the Ministers directly concerned. Mr. Chase is therefore preparing an interim acknowledgment of the letter from the Department of Defense.

2. He told Mr. Ignatieff that an officer on the staff of General Walsh had come to see him, apparently in order to find out how the State Department regarded "the apparent change in the position taken by the Joint Chiefs of Staff" (to use Mr. Chase's words) in seeking to obtain a detailed arrangement in writing covering the handling of requests involving Canadian territory and facilities. Mr. Chase said that he had explained that what really mattered was not the view taken by the State Department, but that of the Canadian Government. He remarked that the State Department was accustomed to rely on the confidence existing between the two governments in dealing with matters of importance rather than on written agreements, and recalled the promptness with which all the requests received from the Air Force had been dealt with in Ottawa. He went on to suggest that the new proposals obviously required very careful consideration in Ottawa, and in speaking to Mr. Ignatieff he was clearly sympathetic with our view that it would be necessary to take some time before commenting on them.

3. Mr. Chase then referred to press reports from Rome of General Eisenhower's remarks to the NATO Council to the effect that while NATO planning could take into account the use of atomic weapons for tactical purposes, this would not reduce the military requirements. He expressed concern lest the degree of experimental development of new types of atomic weapons should be exaggerated and an impression conveyed that would over-emphasize the results attained and also the military value of such weapons in field operations.

4. Mr. Chase then referred to the discussions on atomic energy which are expected to take place during Mr. Churchill's visit in January. Neither the State Department nor the British Embassy has received any information on the line which Mr. Churchill is likely to take, and it is not unlikely that no advance notice will be given of the particular matters which he will raise. Mr. Chase is now participating in a review of the "position papers" of the State Department on this subject in preparation for the visit. He appreciates that Mr. Churchill may present some difficult questions about the Quebec Agreement, such as securing the consent of both governments before atomic weapons are used and broad issues of the full sharing of information on research and development. In addition, the question of the testing of the first atomic weapon developed in the United Kingdom is still unresolved and no reply has been received from London to the U.S. proposals which were taken back for consideration by Mr. Penney late last summer after his visit to the United States.

5. Sir Oliver Franks told me yesterday that although Mr. Churchill mentioned in a telephone conversation with him that he would want to discuss "the atomic bomb" when he was in Washington, he has received no details whatever. Presumably Lord Cherwell and Sir Roger Makins, who will be accompanying him, will act as his principal advisers in this field. He is not bringing with him any scientific advisers engaged in atomic development in the United Kingdom. Sir Oliver is making no move to continue consultation with the State Department at present and thinks it better to leave matters where they stand, as reported in Wiser Letter No. 20 of November 17th.† Mr. Churchill is already in a position to make a public statement, if necessary, covering both the use of the U.S. bases in the United Kingdom in an emergency and continuing consultations on developments in the world situation.

6. To judge from Mr. Chase's remarks to Mr. Ignatieff, the State Department is likely to seek to restrain any impatience which may be displayed by the Department of Defense over a delay in receiving Canadian comments on their proposals. I close by repeating the opinion which I have previously expressed that we should seek to postpone our comments until after Mr. Churchill's visit to Washington and Ottawa.

Note du chef de la 1ère Direction de liaison avec la Défense pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

UNITED STATES AIR REQUIREMENTS NEWFOUNDLAND — TORBAY

At a meeting in Air Vice Marshal James' Office this morning, General Whitten, Commanding General, United States Northeast Command, explained that the air requirements in the Newfoundland area were much greater than previously anticipated. He said that at a meeting of SAC, MATS and his Command recently it had been agreed that existing facilities would be quite inadequate in the event of hostilities. In particular, they would wish the use of Torbay and, if available, would want facilities greatly enlarged there. Improvements would include extension of two of the present runways to 9000 feet to take B36's, as well as extensive areas for "parking", work shops, housing accommodation, etc. He anticipated that expenditure there perhaps would equal or surpass that for 1951 at Goose. Rough estimates have been already made and supplementary appropriations are being asked so that the work could get underway this summer if we are agreeable.

The functions of Torbay would be that of a staging base for SAC and MATS planes going to the Azores or the Mediterranean, although it would also be a staging field for planes going direct to Europe. On enquiry, General Whitten said that it was not anticipated that storage facilities for special weapons would be needed at Torbay except in the event of hostilities. In this respect Torbay would be unlike Goose.

General Whitten said that it was anticipated that another field would also be needed in the event of hostilities and that some thought had been given to an area near Clarenville (or Shoal Harbour) as a possible site. They are not, however, asking for appropriations for such a field this year and I gather that they are not likely to ask us to consent to such a field this year.

It is anticipated that the Appropriations Committee of the Armed Services will deal with General Whitten's request next week and, if the request is approved, we shall likely hear shortly. It was suggested to General Whitten that this matter should be taken up informally before a formal request was made and that the alternative ways would be either an enquiry from the U.S. Air Member, PJBD, to the Canadian Air Member, or the matter might be put on the agenda of the next meeting of the PJBD.

Such a request would raise grave questions for us. We were told only in January that the United States would not have requirements beyond Goose Bay, communication facilities and radar sites in the Newfoundland area. Torbay is on the outskirts of St. John's and its development as proposed would make it more of a target area than at present and especially if used by SAC. This would certainly raise problems of defence, probably both for the RCAF and Canadian Army. Inevitably the question of tenure would be raised. There is perhaps a good deal to be said for Canada developing the field, thus avoiding the questions of title and tenure, even if the cost would be substantial. Construction of the field would be a fair contribution to NATO. There is also something to be said for developing a new field entirely away from the settled area.[37]

Extrait du procès-verbal de la réunion du Comité du Cabinet sur la défense

Extract from Minutes of Meeting of Cabinet Defence Committee

IV. TORBAY AIRPORT; ADDITIONAL FACILITIES FOR, AND SURVEY BY THE U.S.A.F.

32. The Secretary of State for External Affairs recalled that, under a lease between the Department of Transport and the U.S. Northeast Command (St. John's), terminable on 30 days' notice, the U.S. Air Force had the use of a small number of buildings at Torbay airport, the personnel concerned being quartered at the nearby leased base. In view of increased U.S.A.F. maintenance and air freight activities at Torbay, the U.S. Government had enquired in a note of March 6, 1951 whether certain barrack and storage space could be made available to the U.S.A.F. as an addition to the present lease. The U.S.A.F. would carry out certain repairs on these buildings. In addition, in a note of March 5, 1951, the U.S. Government had asked permission for the U.S.A.F. to install and operate certain navigational aids at the airport. These plans involved the quartering of about 260 U.S.A.F. personnel at Torbay. The Chiefs of Staff had recommended approval of the two requests, subject to agreement at the official level on technical aspects of the proposed operation of electronic equipment.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

33. The Minister of National Defence pointed out that these requests probably did not represent the U.S.A.F.'s total requirements at Torbay. The U.S.A.F. might desire to expand the facilities at Torbay to something like the scale contemplated for Goose Bay — and for the same purposes. In this case it would no doubt want a lease along the lines of that proposed for Goose Bay. This would result in a second large U.S. military establishment in the vicinity of St. John's. Acceptance of the present requests, while perhaps difficult to avoid, would inevitably affect the possibility of refusing a subsequent proposal for large-scale development.

34. The Acting Chief of the Air Staff said that he had been informed by the U.S.A.F. that it wished to carry out an early survey of Torbay. An official request for permission for this survey, on which would be based a subsequent request for authority to carry out expansion of U.S. facilities at the airport, was about to be received by the Canadian authorities through the State Department.

35. The Minister of Trade and Commerce saw no real objection to the present U.S. requests. The additional navigation aids would assist both U.S. and Canadian aircraft.

36. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs explained that the fact that the barrack and storage space presently sought by the U.S.A.F. was vacant might make it difficult to refuse to lease it.

37. The Prime Minister agreed that the additional navigation aids would be an asset to Canadian aviation. He suggested that, if it were not wasteful for the United States to expend resources on Torbay, it would be to the general advantage for it to do so and it would therefore be undesirable for Canada to raise obstacles to the U.S.A.F. having additional facilities simply because they would be on Canadian soil. If U.S. requirements at Torbay were consistent with NATO plans, it appeared desirable for Canada to be co-operative in the matter. The United States always met the requests of the Canadian forces for facilities in the United States, as in the case of Fort Lewis, Washington, where the Canadian Army Special Force had trained.

38. The Minister of Finance pointed out that the local population would welcome an increase in U.S. activities at Torbay.

39. Mr. Pearson suggested that there was an appreciable difference between arrangements for Canadian Service units to train in various parts of the United States for a few months and the long-term plan of the U.S.A.F. to maintain a large establishment at Torbay for a number of years. If, eventually, there were a real change in the world situation, there would be no question of large U.S. forces remaining in European countries. It would, however, be more difficult to arrange for U.S. forces to be withdrawn from installations in Canada which would be considered part of the continental defence system. At the same time, there would be obvious difficulties in rejecting the present U.S. requests regarding Torbay.

40. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee pointed out that the more the U.S. forces became involved in Newfoundland, the greater would be the American responsibility for the air defence of the area.

41. The Committee, after further discussion:

(1) approved the requests of the U.S. Government of March 5 and 6, 1951, for certain barrack and storage space at Torbay airport to be made available to the U.S. Air Force as an addition to the present lease, and for permission for the U.S.A.F. to install and operate certain electronic equipment, these projects entailing the quartering of some 260 U.S.A.F. personnel at the airport;

(2) agreed that this decision be reported to Cabinet later in the day;

(3) agreed that there was no objection to the U.S.A.F. carrying out an early survey of Torbay if, on receipt, the official request for this survey were considered satisfactory by the Ministers of National Defence, External Affairs and Transport.[38]

[38] À sa réunion du 17 avril 1951, le Cabinet plénier a noté avec approbation le rapport du ministre de la Défense nationale portant sur ces décisions.
At its meeting on April 17, 1951, the full Cabinet noted with approval the report of the Minister of National Defence on these decisions.

Note de la 1ère Direction de liaison avec la Défense pour le chef de la 1ère Direction de liaison avec la Défense

Memorandum from Defence Liaison (1) Division to Head, Defence Liaison (1) Division

SECRET [Ottawa], April 23, 1951

Mr. Morgan called this afternoon and left with me Note No. 322 of April 23,† in which authority was requested for the USAF to carry on exploratory conversations with the appropriate Canadian authorities regarding a proposed lease of Torbay Airport, Newfoundland.

2. I pointed out to Mr. Morgan that this was an unusual request. We all knew that informal discussions on defence projects were taking place all the time without the benefit of a prefatory note. It seemed to me that in effect the note was requiring us to give some sort of agreement in principle to a lease the nature of which was not made clear in the actual note. I went on to point out that the note did not give any indication of the extent of the lease, whether, for instance, the USAF intended to share the airport with the RCAF, or whether they had hopes of taking it over.

3. Mr. Morgan said that a favourable reply to the note would not commit us in principle, since the note said "discussions ... will in no way bind either party to the ultimate leasing of the field". I then asked Mr. Morgan why the note was being presented in this form. He replied that he did not know, since the Embassy had merely been instructed to pass it on, but he assumed that it was merely to give us general warning of intentions. In connection with the intentions, I asked Mr. Morgan if this note was to be taken as an indication that the idea of a new airfield in the Newfoundland interior had been abandoned for the present, or if the two projects were to be considered alternatives. Mr. Morgan said that the Embassy did not know. He asked me whether I wished him to obtain replies to these questions from the State Department, and added that probably A/V/M James knew much more about it than the U.S. Embassy. I said that I would not ask him to obtain any further information at this stage, and promised that I would bring the note to the attention of the appropriate authorities as quickly as possible. I observed to Mr. Morgan that it was perhaps unfortunate that we received this note, in effect suggesting extensive and undefined rights at Torbay, just six days after Cabinet Defence Committee had been asked to consider one specific and limited request on the same field. I mentioned the natural desire of the Canadian authorities to be put entirely in the picture as soon as it appeared feasible. Mr. Morgan said he appreciated this point, but pointed out that although we had replied to the Torbay note only a few days ago, the U.S. note had been in our hands for some time.

5. After Mr. Morgan left, I telephoned A/V/M James to acquaint him with the contents of the U.S. note. He told me that General Walsh had put this up to the State Department a short time ago. A/V/M James considered the note inept, since it asked both for rights to survey, a request which might be easily be granted, as well as a vague half-commitment on the future of the field. The second request would take long consideration and might well hold up the survey. A/V/M James said he was acquainted with U.S. intentions, but he vigorously protested that this did not absolve the U.S. authorities from stating their intentions clearly and precisely in the diplomatic request. I explained to A/V/M James that our initial inclination was to write to the Chiefs of Staff saying that we proposed asking the U.S. authorities for further information. A/V/M James warmly agreed that this was the wisest course of action.

Memorandum from Special Assistant to Prime Minister to Minister of National Defence

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], April 23, 1951

RE FACILITIES IN CANADA FOR JOINT CANADA-U.S. DEFENCE OPERATIONS

You asked me to put briefly in writing the points I tried to make in conversation today about my reflections on the implications of the use of Torbay Airfield by the U.S. forces.

I have been very worried for a long time that sooner or later someone is going to say that while we are sending our legions to defend the frontiers of civilization on the Yalu and the Elbe, we are permitting our own country to be occupied strategically by the Americans. I know this is a very extreme way of putting what is, nevertheless, a disquieting situation.

I do not see why it should be necessary for us to lease any more bases or any other facilities to the Americans for any term of years. What I would suggest instead is that we undertake ourselves to provide any defence facilities which our Chiefs of Staff, after consultation with theirs, are satisfied are required for the joint defence of the continent and that the costs be divided on some ratio to be agreed upon, with an understanding that the facilities be available to the forces of both countries in peace or in war — so long, in the latter case, as both countries are engaged in the same war. That it also be understood that any earnings of U.S. dollars through this arrangement be earmarked exclusively for Canadian defence expenditures in the United States and thereby help to meet the deficit we are likely to incur in reciprocal arms dealings.

In order to make it abundantly clear to the Americans that these demands for facilities do create real political problems for us, it might be worth considering a request for the setting aside for the use of the Canadian Army and Air Force of a training area somewhere in the Southwestern United States, for winter training only, and that in making the request we ask precisely the same privileges and immunities for our forces as the Americans desire to receive for theirs in Canada. This might be an extremely useful exercise, even if we had no intention of using the field, though that possibility by no means needs be ruled out as it might be a great deal cheaper than providing winter quarters in Canada, and might even stimulate recruiting for the Army the way the Caribbean cruises are alleged to do for the Navy.

We have clearly got to face the fact that the Americanization of our army equipment is creating a permanent potential burden on the Canadian economy which the Americans are going to be very reluctant to offset by defence purchases in Canada. On the other hand, they apparently really need defence facilities in Canada for joint defence, and it seems to me that it would be both self-respecting and sensible to make an arrangement whereby we would ourselves provide and control these facilities while agreeing to make them freely available in return for the kind of consideration which would contribute materially to balancing the accounts.

What I would really like to see is a new and much broader Hyde Park which would tie all these things up in a single parcel.[39]

It might even be that the administration at Washington would not be too averse to some move of this kind which might be a distraction from other defence debates now current.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au président du Comité des chefs d'état-major

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee

SECRET Ottawa, April 24, 1951

Dear General Foulkes,

With reference to our telephone conversation, I have received Note No. 322 of April 23 from the United States Embassy, which reads as follows;

"The Ambassador of the United States of America presents his compliments to His Excellency the Secretary of State for External Affairs and has the honor to request the permission of the Canadian Government for the United States Air Force to carry on exploratory discussions with the appropriate Canadian authorities regarding a proposed lease of Torbay Airport, Newfoundland. Present tentative plans of the United States Air Force propose considerable construction and development of that airfield.

"The approval of the Canadian Government is also requested for the United States Air Force to carry out such preliminary engineering surveys at Torbay Airfield as are necessary in connection with the contemplated lease and construction.

"The United States Air Force emphasizes the fact that the proposed discussions will be informal and exploratory and will in no way bind either party to the ultimate leasing of the field. In the event that satisfactory arrangements can be made between the United States Air Force and the appropriate Canadian authorities, it is the intention of the United States Air Force to follow the same procedure which has been used in the matter of the Goose Bay lease to secure the approval of the United States and Canadian Governments; i.e., the two air forces will reach agreement, after which the proposed terms will be referred back to the two Governments for approval."

Several difficult questions are raised by this Note. The first is one of method. It seems to me that, although it would be appropriate for the United States Air Force to discuss with the Royal Canadian Air Force the kind of physical facilities required at Torbay by the U.S.A.F., it would be inappropriate for the two Services to talk about "a proposed lease". The latter is a political rather than a military problem and should, I think, be discussed between the two Governments on a political basis rather than through the two Air Forces as a Service matter.

The second question is one of need and purpose. In this connection a basic factor is the decision of the Standing Group in SGM-267-50 to allocate to the United States, on behalf of all NATO countries, the task of conducting "the strategic air offensive against vital elements of the Soviet war-making capacity". Subsequently the NATO Deputies approved a document (D-D/183)† saying that "member nations should ... agree to give immediate and special attention to ... granting these requirements (for base facilities) as appropriate". Another relevant fact is that the United States has just placed before CUSRPG Planners an amendment to Appendix "G" to the CUSRPG Short Term Plan, and this amendment states that a base at Torbay will be required for the strategic air offensive. Although we have this information from NATO documents, I think that the United States Government ought to give directly to the Canadian Government a clear explanation of the reasons for proposing "considerable construction and development" of Torbay.

The third and most important question, I suggest, is whether we should even consider a "lease" of Torbay or any part thereof. The United States authorities, in drafting the Note, seem to have assumed that, because we agreed to give a lease at Goose Bay, we would accept the idea of a lease at Torbay.

The fact, is, of course, that one of the main reasons for offering a lease at Goose Bay was as an inducement for the settlement of our request for the revision of the Leased Bases Agreement and that reason is not relevant to the Torbay request. I am increasingly worried by the possible consequences to Canadian sovereignty of granting leases to the United States for defence installations. I am inclined to think that the time has come to say that the lease form is inacceptable, although we are of course ready to let the United States use and improve defence facilities in Canada where such use or improvement is shown to be necessary for our joint defence or pursuant to NATO plans. My feelings on this subject have been fortified by the information (in telegram No. 933 of April 18† from Canada House) that the United Kingdom does not give the United States any leases or even "assured rights of occupancy". This question of lease or no lease will of course be for the Government to decide and it is not necessary to settle it now.

The immediate problem to be disposed of is the nature of the first reply to be sent to the United States Embassy. Following is a draft reply which I propose to submit to my Minister:

"The Secretary of State for External Affairs presents his compliments to His Excellency the Ambassador of the United States of America and has the honour to refer to the latter's Note No. 322 of April 23 regarding Torbay Airport.

"The Canadian Government has no objection to the United States Air Force carrying out preliminary engineering surveys at Torbay Airport. Detailed arrangements respecting the surveys should be made by the U.S.A.F. in co-operation with the Royal Canadian Air Force.

"There would be no objection to the U.S.A.F. carrying on exploratory discussions with the R.C.A.F. regarding the physical and technical requirements of the U.S.A.F. at Torbay.

"However, it is desired that any discussions, even of an exploratory character, regarding a proposed lease or other legal rights desired by the United States Government at Torbay should be conducted with the Canadian Government through diplomatic channels and not between the two Air Forces. In preparation for any such discussions, it would be helpful if the Ambassador could provide as much information as possible (other than technical information which will be given through U.S.A.F.—R.C.A.F. channels) regarding the tentative plans of the U.S.A.F. for construction and development of Torbay. Information is also desired regarding the nature of the use which the U.S.A.F. would like to make of Torbay. Thirdly, it would be useful to have an explanation of the place of Torbay in the strategic plans of the U.S.A.F. in the Newfoundland area.

"As the Permanent Joint Board on Defence is meeting on May 7, it is suggested that it would be desirable to ask the Board to consider, at least in a preliminary way, the plans of the United States Government relating to Torbay. Such consideration, even if it did not lead to a specific Recommendation by the Board, would no doubt clarify the questions involved."

As there is little time left before the PJBD meeting, I should be grateful for an early expression of your views on the proposed reply. Also, would you please advise me on the position of the Department of Transport in this matter — ought we to seek their concurrence before agreeing to any surveys at Torbay?

Yours sincerely,

A.D.P. HEENEY

Note du ministre de la Défense nationale pour le Comité des chefs d'état-major

Memorandum from Minister of National Defence to Chiefs of Staff Committee

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], April 24, 1951

The U.S. request for additional facilities at Torbay raises again the implications of increased establishments for joint defence within the territory of Canada. This is not a question as to whether installations that are militarily necessary should be done or not, but a question as to how they should be done and by whom.

Sooner or later someone is going to say that while we are sending our troops to defend the frontiers of civilization on the Yalu and the Elbe, we are permitting our own country to be occupied strategically by the Americans.

Torbay is a case in point. Six months ago Mr. Finletter and General Vandenberg asked me in Washington if we would have any objection to their using Torbay to an increased extent, but without putting in any additional buildings or equipment. The men would be quartered at Fort Pepperrell. The purpose mentioned at that time was for increased transport and possibly fighter protection. Accordingly, I secured Cabinet approval to this development. Now the question is raised as to securing the use of existing buildings for a couple of hundred men who would operate ground control equipment to be installed by the U.S.A.F. We may anticipate that this will be followed soon by a request for permission to develop the airport to something very like Goose Bay. Presumably they would want to have a lease on similar terms so as to justify the construction of permanent buildings for operations and accommodation.

I would be glad if the Chiefs of Staff would consider again the long term implications of these developments and also in the light of the important political considerations involved in our leasing Canadian territory for Canadian defence by United States forces.

Also, as you and your officers will from time to time be discussing developments of this kind with your U.S. opposite numbers, it would be well to have a common attitude which would be put forward with Cabinet approval.

It seems to me that we should reconsider the request for these facilities at Torbay in the light of these larger questions. Would it not be desirable for us to say to the Americans — "If you want ground control at Torbay and we agree that it is desirable, we will put it in and operate it for you. As you will benefit even more from this and as we have not got the equipment at hand, you can put in the equipment and provide a considerable proportion of the personnel, who will be under the command of a Canadian. The cost of installation and operations will be shared between the two countries on an agreed basis, which will be related to their interest in or use of the installation. There will be no question whatever of a cession or lease of Canadian territory or buildings here or anywhere else."

In other words, we would make an arrangement here and in other similar cases similar to that worked out in connection with the radar stations.

In this connection it has come to my attention that apparently the United Kingdom has not granted any lease to the United States for the airfields used by the U.S.A.F. That is still under consideration.

If it is suggested that the U.S. cannot proceed with the construction of permanent or semi-permanent buildings because of some law or regulation, then it is for the U.S. to change the law or regulation.

It should be made clear also that any arrangements of this kind should be on a completely reciprocal basis. For example, I would think it quite proper for us to ask now for the right to use an area of several hundred square miles for training in the United States on terms similar to those in effect at Goose Bay or Churchill.

The Goose Bay lease should not be regarded as a pattern for future action because there we gave a lease in consideration of the United States waiving certain rights in the Newfoundland bases.

There should be no question from now on of leases for any considerable term. We should consider making short term renewable arrangements, always on a basis which recognizes the principle of reciprocal treatment.

We have got to face the fact that the Americanization of our military equipment is creating a permanent burden on the Canadian economy which the Americans are going to be very reluctant to offset by defence purchases in Canada. On the other hand, they really need defence facilities in Canada for joint defence. It seems to me that it would be both self-respecting and sensible to make an arrangement whereby we would ourselves provide and control these facilities while agreeing to make them freely available in return for the kind of consideration which would contribute materially to balancing the accounts, as in the case of the radar arrangement.

In view of the urgency of getting on with Torbay and the visit next week of the C.A.S. to the United States, it would be a good thing to have a session on this with me in the next few days, either Wednesday or Saturday, as I expect to be away at Kingston on Thursday and Toronto on Friday.

TORBAY AIRPORT; SPECIAL FACILITIES FOR USE BY THE UNITED STATES

10. The Minister of National Defence, referring to discussion at the meeting of April 17th, 1951, expressed concern about the implications of any decision to allow the United States to acquire a long term lease of facilities at Torbay. He had instructed the Chief of the Air Staff to indicate to U.S. officials in discussions that the government had gone as far as it was likely to be able to go in granting leases. It might be desirable to have further consideration given to the matter to determine whether some basis could not be worked out by which facilities sought by the United States would be provided by the government of Canada and made available for the forces of both countries in peace or in war, with the United States putting up a substantial fraction of the cost. Something along the lines of the arrangement with regard to radar might be feasible.

11. The Prime Minister thought that possibly the arrangements for North Atlantic Treaty Organization infrastructure might be examined as a pattern.

12. The Cabinet noted the comments of the Minister of National Defence concerning the desirability of giving careful consideration to possible arrangements with the United States, in relation to special defence facilities which might be required in Canadian territory.

Le président du Comité des chefs d'état-major au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], April 25, 1951

Dear Mr. Heeney:

With reference to your letter of April 24th regarding note No. 322 of April 23rd from the United States Ambassador concerning facilities at Torbay. This was discussed at a meeting held in Mr. Claxton's office this morning at which the following were present:

Minister of National Defence
Deputy Minister
Secretary to the Cabinet
Chairman, Chiefs of Staff
Chief of the Air Staff

The suggested course of action in your letter was generally accepted. In regard to your draft reply on page 4, it was agreed that representatives of the United States Air Force and the Royal Canadian Air Force would be authorized to hold exploratory discussions regarding the physical and technical requirements of the USAF at Torbay and the proposed cost of such installations, but that no discussions should take place regarding the lease or sharing of responsibility.

The Chief of the Air Staff was instructed to make these views known to the Chief of the United States Air Force, while in the United States, and to endeavour to ascertain from General Vandenberg the extent of any further requirements of the USAF in Canada.

The Minister of National Defence considered that your reply to the United States Ambassador was not strong enough.[40] He felt that we should definitely make it known now that we have no intention of arranging a lease. On further consideration it was suggested that the matter of whether or not we arrange a lease should not be discussed until a further investigation is made as to the basis on which this matter should be handled. It was also suggested that the question of a base for the use of the United States Strategical Air Force rightly falls within the tasks allotted in the Medium Term Plan of the Canada-United States Regional Group and could well be considered as part of the infrastructure required for NATO. As part of the infrastructure it would then not be necessary to provide for a lease because it is understood that no lease arrangements are being made for any part of the infrastructure in continental Europe.[41] It was felt that this may be the best approach to the Americans if it is desired to avoid a lease, but before a decision is made on the way this matter is to be handled, the question of the costs and manpower involved should be studied, as well as the part to be shared by Canada in any infrastructure arrangement.

In regard to the way in which this question should be handled I would suggest that, if it is decided to negotiate the arrangements for Torbay as a bilateral defence arrangement between Canada and the United States, then the Permanent Joint Board on Defence might be a suitable medium. On the other hand if an approach is to be made as part of the infrastructure to NATO then this should not be referred to the Board, but should be dealt with as a normal NATO matter.[42]

I would suggest that perhaps your Minister would wish to clear the proposed answer[43] to the American Ambassador with Mr. Claxton because of his desire to make it clear now that Canada was not contemplating any lease arrangements.[44] [45]

Yours sincerely,

CHARLES FOULKES

Note du ministre de la Défense nationale pour le premier ministre

Memorandum from Minister of National Defence to Prime Minister

1. As I mentioned at the Cabinet yesterday, I am very much concerned about the long term implications of joint defence developments at Torbay and elsewhere. I had already sent a note on this to the Chiefs of Staff largely based on a memorandum which Jack [Pickersgill] did for me following a talk we had on this subject. It was arranged that I should meet General Foulkes, Air Marshal Curtis, Mr. Robertson and Mr. Drury this morning. By a coincidence Mr. Heeney had just received a note from the United States asking for a lease to Torbay, no doubt looking towards a major development along lines we had anticipated. As I have to be in Kingston tomorrow and this matter very probably will come before the Cabinet, I am taking the liberty of sending you this note of my views.

2. As a party to the North Atlantic Treaty Canada has agreed under Article 3 that "the Parties separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack". The twelve nations have also agreed that the United States Air Force will have the specific role of providing the main strategic bombing force. It is in the interest of Canada and of the preservation of peace by the prevention of aggression that the United States should have the facilities necessary to make the most effective use of its forces. The question that arises now is not a question as to whether steps should be taken. Once we agree that the steps as suggested are strategically desirable and within the capacity of the two countries to carry out, the one remaining question is as to how and by whom the facilities should be provided.

3. The ideal solution would be for each country to do everything considered necessary within its own territory. That, however, is not always possible. The resources of Canada in men, materials and money could not be stretched to cover all the joint activities which should be undertaken in Canada.

4. Moreover, since virtually all defence activities and expenditures in Canada assist the United States and since, on the basis of population or wealth, the United States has a greater capacity to contribute and a mathematically larger interest, it is suggested that we should be ready to accept contributions towards joint activities in Canada, particularly when those relate to the United States or are of direct and considerable benefit to the United States. Certainly, the proposed development of Torbay falls within this class.

5. That having been said, however, it is suggested that activities for our joint defence in Canada should as far as possible be under the immediate control of Canadians and that functions not directly related to the operations of U.S. forces should be performed by Canadians.

6. Applying these principles to the situation at Torbay, it is suggested that we should endeavour to work out an arrangement along the following lines:

(a) Canada would agree to the United States aircraft using the base on terms similar to those in effect at Goose Bay or elsewhere in Canada.

(b) This agreement would be renewable from year to year.

(c) The airfield would be in charge of a Canadian and the R.C.A.F. would supply personnel to man the control tower and administer and maintain the airfield.

(d) The United States would supply ground control and other similar equipment on loan. This equipment could be operated either by Americans or Canadians or both.

(e) Canada would supply free of charge any existing accommodation and the United States would pay for putting it into condition for use.

(f) The United States Air Force would maintain their own aircraft and the services directly related to their operation.

(g) Large scale capital expenditures on runways, hangars, accommodation would be shared by the two countries on an agreed basis.

(h) At the termination of the arrangement the United States could remove any removable equipment subject to our exercising a right of purchase at an agreed price.

7. These arrangements have a very close relationship to the arrangements being discussed for the infrastructure of NATO. It is possible that the principles worked out there might be applied in the case of joint defence activities of this character. In any event consideration should be given to the desirability of our spending money on matters like this in Canada rather than in Western Germany. We should certainly keep to a minimum the instances where the United States is defending North America on Canadian soil while we are using our resources to build up the defences of Western Europe.

8. Whatever arrangement is arrived at should be on a reciprocal basis. Consideration should be given to our asking the United States now for extensive training facilities in the United States.

9. From the financial point of view, the adoption of American equipment will unquestionably place a considerable burden on the Canadian economy which is entirely unlikely to be offset by purchases of Canadian equipment by the United States. Joint defence arrangements should be worked out which will help to put us in a better position to carry out our undertakings.

10. Finally, there is the form of the reply to the note. It seems to me that great care should be taken not to give the impression that opening negotiations will lead to a lease. While it might not be advisable to indicate now that a lease would be out of the question, a suggestion of this might be made by referring throughout to "arrangements for the development of Torbay" and other similar expressions.

11. It is difficult to deal with this in a way which will indicate our willingness to proceed to discuss arrangements for joint defence without either on the one hand expressly saying at the outset that we would not consider a lease, or on the other hand giving the impression that the mere fact of entering into discussions implies that we would be willing to make a lease.

12. Further, at this stage any engineering survey should be done jointly by the air forces of both countries.

13. In view of the scale of expenditures likely to be involved, a survey should be made to see if it would not be advisable to build another airport at a place where the weather is likely to be better.

14. In an effort to meet these points I have tried to redraft parts of the draft reply prepared by Mr. Heeney and enclose a copy of my draft.

[BROOKE CLAXTON]

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Projet d'une réponse pour le Gouvernement des États-Unis

Draft Reply to United States Government

TOP SECRET

The Secretary of State for External Affairs presents his compliments to His Excellency the Ambassador of the United States of America and has the honour to refer to the latter's Note No. 322 of April regarding Torbay Airport.

The Canadian Government has no objection to preliminary engineering surveys being carried on at the moment, but it would appear to it that at this stage such a survey should be carried out by a joint team of U.S.A.F. and R.C.A.F. personnel. If this is acceptable, arrangements might be made directly between the U.S.A.F. and R.C.A.F.

There would be no objection to the U.S.A.F. carrying on exploratory discussions with the R.C.A.F. regarding the physical and technical requirements of the U.S.A.F. at Torbay.

However, it is desired that any discussions, even of an exploratory character, regarding arrangements for the joint use of Torbay should be conducted with the Canadian Government through diplomatic channels and not between the two Air Forces. In preparation for any such discussions, it would be helpful if the Ambassador could provide as much information as possible (other than technical information which will be given through U.S.A.F.-R.C.A.F. channels) regarding the tentative plans of the U.S.A.F. for construction and development of Torbay. Information is also desired regarding the nature of the use which the U.S.A.F. would like to make of Torbay. Thirdly, it would be useful to have an explanation of the place of Torbay in the strategic plans of the U.S.A.F. in the Newfoundland area.

Your enquiry brings up difficult and important questions. It has always been the view of this government that it should be unnecessary to cede or lease any part of American or Canadian territory for purposes of joint defence as the best basis for our common effort was our mutual interest. The one exception to this was in the case of Goose Bay. This was in consideration of the modifications that were being made in the Newfoundland base leases. In the view of the Canadian government, if we consider a project for joint defence militarily desirable and possible, it should be proceeded with in accordance with arrangements which are mutually agreeable and which are in accord with the principles of the declaration of February 12, 1947.[46]

As the Permanent Joint Board on Defence is meeting on May 7, it is suggested that it would be desirable to ask the Board to consider, at least in a preliminary way, the plans of the United States Government relating to Torbay. Such consideration, even if it did not lead to a specific recommendation by the Board, would no doubt clarify the questions involved.

VI. U.S. FACILITIES — TORBAY

21. The Chairman stated that a meeting had been held on 25 April with the Minister of National Defence, the Secretary to the Cabinet, the Chief of the Air Staff and the Deputy Minister to discuss the question of U.S. facilities at Torbay. The view of the meeting had been that there should be no discussion with the U.S. concerning a lease for this base until a further investigation had been made as to the basis on which this matter should be handled. There was, however, no objection to the RCAF and the USAF holding exploratory discussion regarding the physical and technical requirements of the USAF at Torbay and the proposed costs of such installations. The Chief of the Air Staff had been directed at this meeting to make these views known to the Chief of the U.S. Air Force during his forthcoming meetings in Washington and to endeavour to ascertain the extent of any further requirements of the USAF in Canada.

It was suggested that negotiations with the U.S. might be facilitated if their requirements could be classed as part of the infrastructure required for NATO which would then make it unnecessary to provide a lease. If Canada were to contribute to infrastructure it would be preferable to do so in North America rather than in Europe and in this way explain that the USAF request formed part of the larger NATO requirements.

22. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out that if installations in North America were to be included as infrastructure it would be impossible to ascertain where this might end, in that the U.S. might then include all their CUSRPG and SAC installations. The resulting costs would be greater than envisaged at present.

As the Permanent Joint Board on Defence had already dealt with the negotiation of the U.S. lease at Goose Bay and other joint undertakings and were meeting again in the near future it might be desirable to have the Board discuss the U.S. requirements at Torbay in general terms. This would not preclude the question being discussed at a later date as part of NATO.

23. The Chief of the General Staff pointed out that any suggestion by Canada to include bases such as this as a part of infrastructure might possibly lead to an unlimited liability as it was the first suggestion that infrastructure went beyond the boundaries of Europe. It was, therefore, considered undesirable to focus attention on infrastructure and thereby sow the seed of an idea which might result in expenditure by Canada out of all proportion to that now contemplated.

24. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that there was no objection to negotiations being conducted between the RCAF and USAF concerning the technical side of any future development of Torbay but that the question of a lease or the possession of a base was a political question which could only be explored through diplomatic channels;

(b) The Chief of the Air Staff would indicate in his talks with the Chief of the U.S. Air Force the substance of (a) above; and

(c) The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs would prepare a brief for the Chairman of the Canadian Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence concerning the Canadian views on the USAF request for facilities at Torbay which could be discussed in general terms at the forthcoming meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

Note de la 1ère Direction de liaison avec la Défense

Memorandum by Defence Liaison (1) Division

SECRET Ottawa, April 27, 1951

For Mr. Wershof:

STATUS OF U.S. DEFENCE INSTALLATIONS IN CANADA

I understand that we have now reached the point where any further requests by the United States for leases of defence installations on Canadian soil will be resisted.

2. One way in which Canada can avoid giving leases or any form of fixed right or tenure is by offering to finance at least a proportion of the cost of whatever installations on Canadian soil are necessary to the United States (for joint defence or for NATO).[47] It may well be that we shall adopt this policy in a limited form. Torbay is a case in point. The United States has indicated its desire for a lease. We recognize the need to develop the airfield, and might pay for whatever improvements are considered necessary by the United States in order to fulfil its strategic bombing commitments under NATO. The money we spend on the development of the field would be taken into account in NATO burden sharing exercises.

3. Although this solution to the tenure problem is in the long run much preferable to the granting of leases, some difficulties may arise. It might eventually involve us in extremely heavy expenditures which would place an undue burden on Canada as a NATO member. However logical this form of contribution to NATO, there is perhaps a danger that the policy will be misinterpreted in Europe as an attempt to build up North American defences to the detriment of the defence of Europe if the burden of paying for bases in Canada forced us to reduce our contribution to European defences. No matter how we try to counteract that argument, undoubtedly the left-wing press in Europe would try to use it to undermine faith in Europe's North American allies. It might increase the pressure on Canada to send more than a token ground force contribution to the Integrated Force.

4. I suggest that there is something to be said for consideration of yet another arrangement, i.e., rental without lease. In the case of Torbay, we would obtain a statement of total U.S. requirements. Let us say that, after we have reviewed them, we agreed that facilities costing $20 million were fully justified. Canada would then make the entire expenditure. On the assumption that the facilities were of no particular value to Canada economically and were not necessary for the defence of Canada individually but only as a member of NATO, we would then charge the United States annually a sum for its use of the facilities. The annual rental would be based on an amortization period which would be fixed in accordance with the nature of the facilities; it might vary from ten to twenty years (i.e., the period of the North Atlantic Treaty). The United States would have no guarantee of tenure and Canada would have no guarantee that the United States would occupy the installation until the capital costs had been amortized. The financial success of the arrangement would depend upon the ability of the planners to forecast future requirements. Canadian losses could be charged to the protection of sovereignty, and in any event those losses could not be as burdensome as the payment by Canada for all installations without compensation, assuming Canada were to pay for the whole cost of the installations, or a large proportion of it.

5. The rental paid by the United States could be used either to build Canadian armed strength or to finance help to European members of NATO through mutual aid or the stationing of Canadian forces in Europe. The initial costs to Canada would tend to be heavy and, presumably, would eventually taper off. They would thus tend to counterbalance what we must assume will be steadily mounting annual charges for other forms of defence.

6. Rental arrangements without a lease might have considerable political advantages in Canada. Not only would it forestall charges of giving undue rights to the United States in Canada, but it would answer any allegation from Canadian sources that we are paying for U.S. activities in Canada not needed by Canada.

7. Finally, the undertaking by Canada of substantial installations for U.S. use, since it would initially result in inflated defence budgets, should end for all time charges of Canadian feet dragging. It is possible that a new charge of profiteering might arise, but not if the "rent" were turned over to national or NATO defence purposes.[48]

PROPOSED U.S. SURVEYS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

I am attaching a copy of Note No. 324 of April 30,† received today, in which the U.S. Embassy asks the permission of the Canadian Government for the USAF to conduct surveys on the Island of Newfoundland for the purpose of finding potential air base sites. This request appears to be a clear indication that the U.S. authorities do not consider that the Leased Bases, together with Goose Bay and Torbay, will be able to satisfy U.S. requirements in the Newfoundland area. On completion of these surveys, it is reasonable to expect one or more requests for permission to establish new bases in Newfoundland.

Since this new request does not appear to affect our reply to the U.S. Note on the Torbay lease, we are asking the Department of National Defence for its views on this new Note through the usual channels. If you agree, it might be well to brief General McNaughton on the latest U.S. request, for it should provide useful material when he is asking the U.S. Section, P.J.B.D. for a frank statement of the total foreseeable requirements of the USAF in Eastern Canada.[49]

TORBAY AIRFIELD

Mr. Bliss, the United States Minister, called on me at my request this afternoon. I handed to him our reply to the United States Note of April 23 regarding the lease of Torbay airfield.[50] Mr. Bliss observed that the Note raised two "$64 questions". First the use which the United States Air Force wished to make of Torbay and, second, scope of their overall plans and requirements in Newfoundland. He said that he would like to sketch to me the background of the U.S. Note on Torbay airfield and their further Note asking to make aerial reconnaissances over Newfoundland.

2. Mr. Bliss said that when General Whitton was in Ottawa on March 22nd last, he had had conversations with A/V/M James on this subject, at which it would be recalled Mr. MacKay and he himself had been present. General Whitton had then raised the question of further U.S. requirements at Torbay. A/V/M James had pointed out that the Minister of National Defence would "hit the ceiling" if the use of Torbay for certain purposes was put up to him. After the conversations, Mr. Bliss had said to General Whitton that he thought it was obvious that the Canadian Government could not accept the use of Torbay for these purposes. It was so near St. John's, that any proposal which was more likely to make the city a target for enemy attack would probably be refused by the Canadian Government. He had therefore suggested to General Whitton that he should make every effort to find a site or sites more remote from the capital for these purposes. Meanwhile, however, the U.S. Air Force would have great need of Torbay for other purposes. The U.S. Air Force had, Mr. Bliss thought, agreed with this approach to the problem. Speaking personally, therefore, he thought he could say that it was not proposed to use Torbay in connection with the storage or delivery of atomic bombs. The request for aerial reconnaissance flights was, Mr. Bliss understood, with the object of selecting a site or possibly two sites in remoter parts of the island for such purposes.

3. So far as overall U.S. service plans and requirements in Newfoundland were concerned, Mr. Bliss thought that A/V/M James now knew as much about this subject as anyone. General Whitton had explained that it was impossible to give a complete blueprint of future requirements. They could not guarantee at any given stage that these requirements might not be expanded. Mr. Bliss understood that A/V/M James had explained this position to the Defence Committee of the Cabinet, who had been satisfied that it was impossible at this stage to give a complete and final picture of U.S. plans and requirements.

4. I said that I knew there were those interchanges between the U.S. Air Force and the R.C.A.F. and this was excellent as far as it went. On the other hand, the Canadian Government had received and continued to receive a series of requests piecemeal for the extension of facilities and installations in Newfoundland and elsewhere. We understood that it might not be possible to produce a tidy blueprint of future plans and requirements and that the U.S. Air Force might not be able to give us at this stage positive guarantees of the limits of their requirements. On the other hand, I suggested that it must surely be possible to indicate the general objectives of planning in the area and the inter-relationship of the different U.S. requests so that the Canadian Government could have a coherent concept for their consideration.

5. I then mentioned, in connection with the last paragraph in our Note, that we hoped that the U.S. would put Torbay on the agenda for the forthcoming meeting of the PJBD on May 7. I said that we hoped that the U.S. would agree that the PJBD was the most appropriate place in which to discuss the kind of questions which he and I had just been talking over. Mr. Bliss raised the objection that to describe the uses to which the U.S. Air Force might wish to put Torbay or alternative sites in Newfoundland might involve discussing questions connected with the storage and delivery of the atomic bomb. This would be undesirable, as information on this subject was, of course, severely limited and it was his understanding that no one but the Under-Secretary in this Department was informed on this subject. PJBD was clearly not the place to discuss such questions. I said that this was not at all the sort of discussion which the Canadian Government had in mind. He had, I said, pointed out the close relations between the U.S. Air Force and the R.C.A.F. but the request for a lease at Goose Bay, the probability that other sites in Newfoundland would be required for other purposes, the whole developing process of U.S. requirements and their relation to overall planning raised political issues of pretty far-reaching importance. These broader questions could most properly be discussed in the PJBD which had such a fine record in working out satisfactory compromise arrangements between us in the past.

6. Mr. Bliss said that in view of my remarks he was disposed to believe that the PJBD would be the appropriate place to discuss Torbay and that he would recommend to his Government that they should put it on the agenda. He hoped to be able to let me have their reply by tomorrow evening.

7. Mr. Bliss did not ask me directly whether the Canadian Government were favourably disposed to granting a lease for Torbay. He did say, however, that he thought that the question of the lease should be approached from the point of view of our joint responsibilities under the North Atlantic Treaty and that such a lease should therefore have the same duration as the North Atlantic Treaty, i.e. twenty years. On the other hand, Congress might find it pretty hard to swallow a proposition by which very large sums were expended by the U.S. for a lease of such short duration. I replied that the whole question of leases in such cases involved important principles for the Canadian Government and should therefore be discussed in the PJBD. Mr. Bliss replied that what was involved was whether or not we were to go on together in the defence of the North American Continent. To this observation, I replied that there could surely be no question in anyone's mind, least of all in that of the Canadian Government, as to our complete agreement on the basic principles of our cooperation in the defence of the North American Continent.

C.S.A. R[ITCHIE]

P.S. Later in the afternoon, Mr. Bliss telephoned me to say that he was informed from Washington that agreement had been reached between A/V/M James and General Walsh that Torbay should be placed on the agenda at the forthcoming meeting of the PJBD. He therefore regarded this question as settled satisfactorily and asked whether we required a formal note in confirmation. I said that I did not think that this would be necessary in view of his assurances.

U.S. PLANS AT TORBAY

Note No. 322 of April 23, 1951 from the U.S. Embassy, Ottawa, reads as follows:[51]

2. The reply, Note No. D-118 of May 1, reads as follows:

"The Secretary of State for External Affairs presents his compliments to His Excellency the Ambassador of the United States of America and has the honour to refer to the latter's Note No. 322 of April 23 regarding Torbay Airport.

"The Canadian Government has no objection to preliminary engineering surveys being carried on at the moment, but it would appear to it that at this stage such a survey should be carried out by a joint team of U.S.A.F. and R.C.A.F. personnel. If this is acceptable, arrangements might be made directly between the U.S.A.F. and R.C.A.F.

"There would be no objection to the U.S.A.F. carrying on exploratory discussions with the R.C.A.F. regarding the physical and technical requirements of the U.S.A.F. at Torbay.

"However, it is desired that any discussions, even of an exploratory character, regarding the arrangements desired by the United States Government at Torbay should be conducted with the Canadian Government through diplomatic channels and not between the two Air Forces. In preparation for any such discussions, it would be helpful if the Ambassador could provide as much information as possible (other than technical information which will be given through U.S.A.F.-R.C.A.F. channels) regarding the tentative plans of the U.S.A.F. for construction and development of Torbay. Information is also desired regarding the nature of the use which the U.S.A.F. would like to make of Torbay. Thirdly, it would be useful to have an explanation of the place of Torbay in the strategic plans of the U.S.A.F. in the Newfoundland area.

"As the Permanent Joint Board on Defence is meeting on May 7, it is suggested that it would be desirable to ask the Board to consider, at least in a preliminary way, the plans of the United States Government relating to Torbay. Such consideration, even if it did not lead to a specific Recommendation by the Board, would no doubt clarify the questions involved."

Previous History

3. Before discussing this U.S. request, it may be helpful to summarize the previous history of U.S. activities at Torbay:

(a) As from November 1, 1946, the USAF had a lease of a hangar from the Department of Transport, subject to cancellation on thirty days notice.

(b) In May, 1948, the USAF was given permission to install G.C.A., but this was not installed at that time.

(c) In October, 1948, it was decided to give the USAF a lease until 1968 (with a 30 day cancellation clause) of another hangar and other buildings.

(d) In March, 1951, the U.S. asked for permission to install G.C.A. and extensive radio equipment. At the same time they asked for a lease of several buildings for NCO quarters and mess, and for stores, required because of "accelerated aircraft maintenance activities." This request involved the stationing of 260 U.S. military personnel at the airport on a full time basis. Both requests were granted on April 19, after consideration by Cabinet; the additional buildings are to be added to the existing lease which expires in 1968 (but which has a 30 day cancellation clause).

(e) On April 4 CJS, Washington, sent to Ottawa a revised draft Appendix "G" to the CUSRPG Short Term Plan. This draft, which listed Torbay among the bases that would be required in Canada for the U.S. strategic air offensive, was the first official indication of U.S. plans for Torbay.

General Observations

4. Canada is obligated under NATO arrangements to give the U.S. such base facilities as may be necessary to enable the U.S. to carry out the task, assigned to it by NATO, of conducting the strategic air offensive against the U.S.S.R. By listing Torbay in the revised draft appendix referred to, the U.S. has indicated that a base at Torbay is necessary for this air offensive. However, to date the U.S. Government has not explained to the Canadian Government why a bomber base at Torbay is essential or how it would fit into the overall strategic air plan.

5. Assuming that a bomber base at Torbay is shown to be necessary for the strategic air offensive, the next and main question is what the U.S. has a right to expect from Canada. Judging from the Note of April 23, the U.S. Government assumed that they should expect a long-term lease. This is not regarded as appropriate by the Canadian Government. During World War II, we did not give the U.S. long leases on airfields but merely occupancy "for the duration". In the United Kingdom, we have learned, the U.S. has not received leases of airfields used by the USAF, or even assured rights of occupancy. It is true that we have agreed to give a lease at Goose Bay but that was not intended as a precedent; in any case, that lease was part of a wider settlement involving amendment of the Leased Bases Agreement.

6. The basic principles of peacetime defence co-operation between the United States and Canada were laid down in the joint statement of February 12, 1947, and they should always be kept in mind. Principles (4), in part, and (5) are:

"(4) Mutual and reciprocal availability of military, naval and air facilities in each country; this principle to be applied as may be agreed in specified instances ..."

"(5) As an underlying principle all co-operative arrangements will be without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory."

We take seriously Principle No. (5) and see no reason why the real needs of the U.S. at Torbay cannot be met without departing from that principle.

7. The United States authorities should try to understand that a sovereign country cannot be expected to like the idea of granting long-term leases of military installations even to the friendliest of allies.

8. There is no NATO requirement, nor any rule of logic, to the effect that the United States should receive a lease of an airport just because the use and development of that airport by the United States are necessary in the allied cause. It is perfectly feasible for Canada to allow the USAF to make full use of Torbay without any question of lease or of guaranteed legal rights of occupancy.

9. It is conceivable that the proposed diplomatic discussions between the two governments regarding Torbay may result in an agreement by the Canadian Government to bear the cost of part of the construction found to be necessary (e.g., the cost of lengthening the runways). Other types of financial arrangement are possible. However, the Canadian Section of the PJBD is not authorized to enter into any financial discussions, even of an exploratory character, and in particular is not authorized to suggest that Canada may share in the financial burden of developing Torbay.

10. The preceding paragraphs are for the background information of the Canadian Section. Following is an outline of points which might be made when speaking to the Board as a whole.

11. Points to be Made when Speaking to the PJBD

(1) Canada is not merely willing but anxious to co-operate with the United States in projects required in Canada for our joint defence or for NATO.

(2) As stated in our Note No. D-118, full information is desired regarding the construction plans of the USAF at Torbay, the use proposed to be made of Torbay, and its place in the wider plans of the USAF in the Newfoundland area. As much of this information as is now available should be given to the Board in order that the Board may discuss it.

(3) In the opinion of the Canadian authorities it would be helpful to both governments if the U.S. Section would as soon as possible give a broad outline of all U.S. requirements and plans involving construction or development in Canada. It is not necessary to wait until a final decision has been made by the U.S. Government before telling the Canadian authorities of a proposal. The PJBD can serve a very useful function by discussing the U.S. projects in Canada at a relatively early stage of their planning.

(4) The Canadian Government's view is that it should not grant any further long term leases for defence purposes in Canada, and that this particular method of enabling the U.S. to use airports or other defence installations should not be used in future. If there were no other way of meeting essential joint defence needs, this objection might have to give way. However, in the view of the Canadian Government, that is not the case. There will be no difficulty, without affecting Canadian sovereignty over any of its soil, in permitting the United States to use and develop a Canadian installation such as Torbay if that use and development is found to be necessary to our joint defence or for NATO. (The objection to the lease method does not necessarily apply to mere leases of buildings, terminable on notice, such as the recently approved lease of buildings at Torbay. There is little resemblance between that kind of lease, which is more in the nature of an ordinary real estate transaction, and the kind of lease which the Canadian Government has agreed to give at Goose Bay.)

(5) One of the principles of defence co-operation set forth in the joint statement of February 12, 1947, is that "all co-operative arrangements will be without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory." The Canadian Government wishes this principle to be regarded as basic in any discussion of U.S. defence needs in Canada.

(6) It will be appreciated that the NATO Deputies in London are now considering various defence projects in Europe to which Canada will be expected to contribute. Obviously Canadian co-operation in joint U.S.-Canadian enterprises for NATO purposes on this continent will have to be considered in relation to our overall contribution to such NATO defence projects.

(Note for Canadian Section: This memorandum has been approved by the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.)

U.S. DEFENCE INSTALLATIONS IN CANADA

At a meeting held in Mr. Pearson's office on May 3, Mr. Claxton referred to seven points which he thought should govern Canadian policy with respect to U.S. air installations in Canada. Although these are in a slightly different form, I understand that the points listed below are the main considerations which Mr. Claxton had in mind:

(a) Canada would agree to the United States aircraft using the base on terms similar to those in effect at Goose Bay or elsewhere in Canada.

(b) This agreement would be renewable from year to year.

(c) The airfield would be in charge of a Canadian and the R.C.A.F. would supply personnel to man the control tower and administer and maintain the airfield.

(d) The United States would supply ground control and other similar equipment on loan. This equipment could be operated either by Americans or Canadians or both.

(e) Canada would supply free of charge any existing accommodation and the United States would pay for putting it into condition for use.

(f) The United States Air Force would maintain their own aircraft and the services directly related to their operation.

(g) Large scale capital expenditures on runways, hangars, accommodation would be shared by the two countries on an agreed basis.

(h) At the termination of the arrangement the United States could remove any removable equipment subject to our exercising a right of purchase at an agreed price.

Note de la 1ère Direction de liaison avec la Défense

SECRET Ottawa, May 7, 1951

For Mr. Wershof:

NEW U.S. DEFENCE INSTALLATIONS IN CANADA

As the Government has virtually decided not to grant further leases to the U.S. for defence installations in Canadian territory, some alternative basis for negotiations with the Americans will have to be worked out. Assuming that the Canadian Government is going, in some way or other, to grant the U.S. the use of whatever facilities they need for Continental or NATO defence, there appear to be three possible approaches to the problem:

(a) some form of rental scheme amortizing capital charges paid by Canada,

(b) a proportionate sharing of the capital charges as agreed between Canada and the U.S.,

(c) a proportionate sharing of capital charges by all NATO members through an application of the infrastructure formula.

The possibilities of (a) above have already been discussed in Mr. Phillips' memorandum to you of April 27. Perhaps the chief difficulty with this approach is that it would place on the Canadian economy a heavy burden of capital charges during what is at present assumed to be the peak years of defence expenditure — barring, of course, a war.

As regards (b), the advantage to Canada would obviously depend on what share we would have to pay and how a final settlement would be reached after the emergency is over.

The possibilities of (c) would, I think be of value chiefly in persuading the Americans to accept a high proportion of the capital charges, as proposed under (b) above. The U.S. Strategic Air Command plans will never be tabled in NATO and the USSAC will probably not be willing to discuss even the location of their airfields if they can possibly help it. The U.S. Government will therefore refuse to consider S.A.C. airfields under the infrastructure programme. The suggestion that the USSAC bases in Canada could be regarded as infrastructure would also, of course, be resisted by our European partners. In addition, it might be argued with some justice that USSAC, although filling the NATO responsibility entrusted to the U.S., has other reasons for its existence. The U.S. would have to have a Strategic Air Command even if there were no NATO, and in fact the USSAC might be used, if the President of the United States so decides, in circumstances having nothing to do with the North Atlantic Treaty — e.g. Korea.

Using the analogy of infrastructure with the Americans might, however, be a way of justifying Canada paying the modest proportion of costs that Canada will probably be paying for infrastructure charges in Europe, i.e. about 8%, on the basis of present negotiations. By allowing some offset for the residual value of the airfields in Newfoundland to the Canadian economy after the emergency, Canada might pay 10% or 15%. This might be a starting point in negotiations with the Americans undertaken with the object of reaching an agreed sharing of costs while giving the U.S. no further tenure in Canada as of right. But we should be careful to avoid, if possible, having our infrastructure argument backfire by being applied retroactively to installations in Canada which the Americans have already paid for in toto. For this reason alone, I think it would be unwise to bring up infrastructure as a formal proposal applicable to Torbay, although it might be useful to use it, as I have suggested, as an analogy for justifying a low proportion of the capital charges being paid for by Canada, even though we are not going to give the Americans a lease.

4. (TOP SECRET) Plans for Torbay and Other Defence Installations in Newfoundland. The Canadian Chairman referred to recent requests from the U.S. Government (Note No. 322 of April 23† and Note No. 324 of April 30† from the U.S. Embassy in Ottawa) which indicated the desire of the U.S. authorities to acquire extensive new facilities in Newfoundland. He pointed out that Canada is not merely willing but most anxious to co-operate with the U.S. in projects required in Canada for the joint defence of North America or as a result of our commitments under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. He said that the Canadian Government would view most sympathetically any request which the U.S. might submit to further these two ends. The Canadian Government did not, however, believe that it was necessary for the U.S. to acquire any further leases in Canada for defence purposes. There would be no difficulty from the point of view of Canadian sovereignty, in permitting the U.S. to use and develop a Canadian installation if that use and development were found to be necessary to our joint defence or for NATO.

The Canadian Chairman emphasized that before formal consideration could be given to U.S. requirements for further facilities the Canadian Government wished to obtain a clearer picture of the plans of the U.S. services in Canada. He said that although the Canadian authorities appreciated the desire of the U.S. Government to avoid discussing plans which were highly tentative and might be changed from time to time, it was very difficult for the Canadian Government to consider piecemeal requests without a general knowledge of U.S. plans for facilities in Canada. He thought it desirable that Canada should be kept informed at an early stage of all plans of the U.S. armed forces involving requirements in Canada.

The U.S. Air Member discussed the tentative plans for his service for the development of Torbay as an additional site which might be made available for the use of the various commands of the USAF.

The U.S. Air Member pointed out that in addition to the survey of Torbay which had been requested by the USAF, his office had also requested the Canadian Government's concurrence in the carrying out of surveys of the Island of Newfoundland with a view to locating additional sites which might be suitable for airports. His thought was that other sites might be found that would be more acceptable to the Canadian Government and equally desirable for the purposes of the USAF. After some discussion, the Canadian Section agreed that the particular survey of Torbay and also the general surveys of the Island of Newfoundland should proceed forthwith as matters of high priority. It was also agreed that the Canadian Section would refer the entire question back to their Government for further consideration.

After considerable discussion in the Board of the various factors involved, the Canadian Chairman agreed that he would take back to Ottawa the information received from the USAF. This information would be placed before the appropriate Canadian authorities for consideration as a matter of urgency.

NATO INFRASTRUCTURE AND THE UNITED STATES REQUEST FOR LEASE OF TORBAY AIRPORT

In his letter to the Under-Secretary of April 25, General Foulkes states "It was also suggested that the question of a base ... could well be considered as part of the infrastructure required for NATO. As part of the infrastructure it would then not be necessary to provide for a lease because it is understood that no lease arrangements are being made for any part of the infrastructure in continental Europe."

2. It should not be overlooked that Mr. Wilgress on our express instructions (emanating from the Department of Finance) has pressed in the Deputies for adoption of a rental scheme, originally for SHAPE capital costs and latterly for European infrastructure. The special committee set up by the Deputies to investigate the technical aspects of the different proposals for sharing costs of infrastructure includes in its terms of reference:

"To report upon the feasibility and the practical aspects of ... (1) The suggestion of the Canadian Deputy that the capital cost of certain infrastructure should be met by the host government which would then lease (sic) the installations to the user government or to NATO as a whole."

3. It is possible that the rental scheme advanced by Wilgress in the Deputies might be used by the United States in pressing for a lease arrangement at Torbay. I am aware, of course, that there may be a world of difference between leasing and renting but the wording of the terms of reference above does seem a little embarrassing to me. I therefore put this to you as something which ought to be considered in preparing our resistance to the pressure which seems inevitable. I am sending you two extra copies of this memo in case you want to pass them on to the Under-Secretary and Mr. Ritchie.

NEW U.S. DEFENCE INSTALLATIONS IN CANADA

I refer to Mr. George's memo to Mr. Wershof dated May 7 on this subject.

2. There are one or two minor points in Mr. George's memorandum to which I might, in the light of events which have occurred since the memorandum was written, apply correction.

3. In para 1(c) Mr. George states that as one of three possible approaches to the general problem raised, "a proportionate sharing of the capital charges by all NATO members through an application of infrastructure formula" might be adopted. It ought to be kept in mind that no formula has yet been adopted nor do we see one emerging not only until all the technicalities are examined very carefully by the Working Committee set up by the Deputies but until their findings have subsequently been examined by the governments of member states.

4. In his last paragraph Mr. George refers to the "modest appropriation of costs that Canada will probably be paying for infrastructure charges in Europe, i.e., about 8% on the basis of present negotiations." The figure of 8% has never been mentioned as the possible basis for Canada's contribution under infrastructure. In any formula adopted for the final settlement, or even for an interim settlement, of infrastructure, Cabinet Defence Committee has specifically restricted our participation to a basis of capacity to pay (national income). Our percentage, even assuming that this formula is adopted, which is by no means certain, would involve us at most in 3.72%.

5. As I have already stated verbally, I share Mr. George's doubts as to the advisability of financially linking the Torbay extension with European infrastructure. But I even question its usefulness as an analogy for justifying a low Canadian participation in the sharing of costs at Torbay. In my opinion, the less we pay at Torbay, the weaker our position will be in resisting pressure for a lease. On the other hand, the more we pay at Torbay, the stronger will be our position on the lease question and the more credit we will get in the final outcome of the burden-sharing operation. This may be over-simplifying, but I think it makes some sense.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, May 21, 1951

Dear Andy [McNaughton],

Obviously we must anticipate the development of further arrangements with regard to joint defence with the United States. In any discussions it seems to me that all our representatives should always make it plain that any arrangements must be in accordance with certain general principles. If all the Americans concerned come to understand this, it should simplify negotiations and prevent misunderstanding.

The principles, I suggest, should be along the lines of the following:

(1) Canada should be prepared to enter into any project we consider to be in the interest of joint defence.

(2) Once a project is considered by us to be desirable, the only question remaining is the terms on which it is to be carried out.

(3) All projects in Canada should be carried out by us as Canadian projects.

(4) If the project is of advantage to the United States we should be willing to accept assistance in money, materials, men and the loan of equipment without charge.

(5) The extent of United States participation should depend on the extent of United States interest. If the matter is exclusively of advantage to the United States we should be prepared to have the United States cover the whole cost. Ordinarily, however, we would have an interest and the extent of participation should be roughly determined, as was done in the case of the radar stations, with the United States paying, say two-thirds, or some other round sum figure. Ordinarily, the division should be on a round figure share basis like one-third, one-quarter, etc.

(6) In no circumstances will there be a long term lease. Usually the arrangements should be automatically renewed from year to year, but terminable at any time upon notice.

(7) In the event of termination the United States could remove any detachable equipment we did not want to pay for. Permanent installations would be left where they are without further payment.

(8) In no circumstances would an establishment in Canada be under the overriding command of a United States officer.[52]

(9) All arrangements must be on a reciprocal basis.

Impossible [R.A. MacKay]

It might be desirable for us to ask the United States for an arrangement under which we would have the use of a large area, say one hundred square miles, in a suitable part of the United States, for training purposes.

In this general connection it is interesting to note that so far the United Kingdom has not granted leases to the United States, but has paid half the capital cost and one half the cost of maintenance up to United Kingdom standards. This appears in a telegram from our High Commissioner at London, dated April 18, 1951, No. 933.†

Applying these principles to the case at Torbay, it seems to me that we should be prepared to consider an arrangement along the following lines:

(1) The R.C.A.F. and U.S.A.F. could make a joint survey of Torbay and other possible sites. With the R.C.A.F. should be associated a representative of the Department of Transport.

(2) The R.C.A.F. or Department of Transport would continue to control and operate the airfield. To this end it would command the control tower and maintain the runways and administration buildings, as well as the buildings occupied by Canadians.[53]

(3) The United States and Canada would participate in the cost of constructing runways and other permanent installations, to be used by both nations. The cost would be shared in proportion to the estimated extent of use by each country.

(4) In the case of hangars, etc. specially built to house U.S. aircraft, which would not be required by Canada in any event, the cost might be entirely borne by the United States.

(5) The United States would supply the men and equipment to maintain its own aircraft.

(6) Barrack accommodation or married quarters would be paid for by the country using them or alternatively we could pay for their cost and charge a rental.

(7) Special equipment which the United States has and we have not got might be loaned and possibly operated by the United States without payment.

(8) At each installation there should be a joint plan for combined action to defend the station against direct attack. Any ground troops specially detailed for this purpose and not having any other duties, eg. full time anti-aircraft, should be Canadian.[54]

Our plans should of course cover the case of command in the event of general war. While it would generally be desirable that command in Canada should be exercised by a Canadian, this might be departed from in the interest of coordination and special cases. For example, for purposes of air defence, North America is a single territory and might be under the overriding command of a United States officer with Canadians and Americans in charge of various sections.

From the talks we have had, I feel that these views will largely coincide with your own, but perhaps it would be a good thing if you could let me have your comments or suggestions on the foregoing. If our views coincide, I would then put these views to Mr. Pearson and we might put the result before the Cabinet Defence Committee, so that we would have Cabinet authority for the attitude to be taken in future discussions. I realize that there will probably be cases where it will be desirable to depart from the foregoing in some respect or another, but we should have before us a set of objectives which we regard as generally desirable.[55]

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 23, 1951

Dear Brooke [Claxton],

I was very glad to receive your letter of 21 May 1951 in which you outlined some general principles which might govern our negotiations with the Americans on joint defence projects. In a separate letter, I shall refer specifically to Torbay, but here I would like to comment more generally on the broad principles which you indicated.

As you have foreseen, my views largely coincide with your own and it seems to me that in your nine points you have given a very clear statement of the position which we should endeavour to establish.

As you well know, our relations with the U.S. in matters of defence policy have been undergoing a steady development in the past year and a half. This is clearly reflected in the changing status of the facilities in Canada for U.S. use or for joint use which we have been able to achieve in our negotiations with our U.S. colleagues. From our point of view, the Goose Bay Lease was a very long step forward from the arrangements at the Newfoundland Leased Bases. We advanced a good deal further with the extension of the Continental Air Defence System when it came up for discussion at the beginning of this year. We were then successful in establishing that the idea of leases was outmoded and we made arrangements whereby contributions were based on proportionate use of the facility as a whole. At the last meeting of the Board, in Kingston, we made our position substantially clearer by taking advantage of an appropriate opening to state that Canada was not prepared to grant any further leases although we were ready to cooperate fully in all necessary defence projects.

[55] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I don't think this letter should be referred to in other doc[ument]s unless Mr. Claxton sends us a copy. R.A.M[acKay].

I fully agree with you that it is important that we give close thought to the fundamental principles governing Canada-U.S. defence policy, but I am not sure that we have yet reached the time to define this policy jointly with the U.S. authorities. I am apprehensive that in the United States if this were attempted at present there might be some misunderstanding of our purpose in enunciating a set of principles which is, in effect, clearly designed to protect our own position; we might be thought to show some lack of confidence in U.S. motives. Further, with the development of NATO defence plans, including both armed forces and infrastructure installations, we are entering a new era in which Canada-U.S. defence policy is necessarily related to the larger NATO picture. As the pattern of U.S. requests and of NATO planning develops, it may be to our advantage to adjust our present thinking in some respects. For these reasons, I would offer it as my personal opinion that we should not, at this stage, seek any agreed set of principles with our U.S. colleagues. At the same time, I should like to emphasize again the far-reaching importance to us of a thorough consideration of our long-term policy and in this connection I think it would be very useful to the Canadian Section of the Board to have for its own guidance a set of general principles such as you have outlined and which could have been agreed to by yourself and your colleagues as a basis from which we could approach particular problems as they are raised for consideration.

Yours sincerely,

A.G.L. McNaughton

Dear Mr. Claxton,

As you know, at the last meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, we discussed at some length the U.S. requirements at Torbay and elsewhere in Newfoundland. In reply to the U.S. request of April 23, we have given permission for the USAF to make surveys jointly with the Canadian authorities. It appears that we can anticipate further U.S. requests for substantial new facilities at Torbay.

The use to which the USAF would put facilities at Torbay is directly related to the U.S. strategic bombing role under NATO. It seems to me, therefore, that our policy on U.S. activities in Torbay — as well as similar undertakings elsewhere — must be considered in the light of general NATO arrangements. I am not now in a position to comment on the relation of U.S. facilities at Torbay to NATO infrastructure, though I would like to see a study on the subject prepared by those who are versed in these matters.

I should like to suggest, therefore, that before any final policy is decided for dealing with U.S. requests at Torbay, the subject might be referred to the Economic Panel on Defence Questions. If this suggestion commends itself to you I feel sure that the External Affairs member of the PJBD, who is also a member of the panel, would be able to arrange for the consideration of this question with the urgency which it clearly requires.

Would you let me know what you wish done.

Yours sincerely,

DESPATCH 1995 Washington, June 1, 1951

SECRET

Reference: My Despatch No. 1591 of May 10, 1951.†

U.S. REQUESTS FOR ADDITIONAL DEFENCE FACILITIES IN CANADA

Since the recent meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, officers at the staff level in the State Department have referred on several occasions to the Canadian position with respect to the U.S. request for additional defence facilities as expressed at the last meeting of the Board. They have suggested that it might be desirable to have general discussions between the Embassy and the State Department regarding the type of agreement or agreements which Canada might wish to conclude as a result of the further U.S. request for military base facilities. They have also suggested that consideration might be given to the duration of such a defence agreement, and to the question of whether it might be concluded as a joint Canada-U.S. defence arrangement, or within the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty. So far, we have limited our comments in response, to remarks based upon the memorandum prepared for the Chairman of the Canadian Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence (forwarded under cover of your letter D-1791 of May 2, 1951†) and have indicated that these matters are presently under consideration in Ottawa. We have also stressed the desirability of having as much information as possible concerning the United States plans and requirements involving the construction and development of defence facilities in Canada.

2. From our informal discussions it is apparent that U.S. authorities do not consider the United States' bilateral agreement with Iceland as setting a desirable precedent for any proposed agreement on the construction or operation of additional defence facilities in Canada.[56] What they have indicated that they would like to have (and this, from their standpoint, would be as satisfactory as a lease), would be a long-term agreement, say for 20 years, granting the United States unrestricted "user rights" for military purposes at certain specified sites provided by the Canadian Government. Such an agreement would be adequate to meet both Congressional and military requirements. Congress could be assured that they were not being asked to appropriate funds to construct permanent-type facilities in Canada on sites to which the United States had no long-term rights. United States military authorities would also be in a position, for planning purposes, to count on long-term military rights in respect of their facilities in Canada.

3. While, as a result of the statement of the Canadian Government position made by the Chairman of the Canadian Section at the last meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, the United States authorities have understood that we would not be disposed to grant any further long-term leases for defence purposes in Canada, they are now inclined to seek a solution, on the basis of a defence agreement within NATO or otherwise, which would give the United States unrestricted "user rights" for military purposes for as long a duration as may be agreed, if possible for 20 years.

4. I am not sure whether this approach is consistent, in letter and in spirit, with a principle contained in the joint statement on peacetime co-operation between the United States and Canada of February 12, 1947, which says "As an underlying principle all co-operative arrangements will be without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory". As I understand it, we are quite willing to enter into an agreement with the United States for projects required in Canada for joint defence or in implementation of military requirements in the North Atlantic Treaty. However, once defence facilities in Canada required by the United States were no longer necessary for the implementation of agreed NATO military requirements or mutually agreed joint defence purposes, either government should have the right, after sufficient notice, to terminate or alter the agreement. In other words, the United States would not have blanket permission to use the facilities for any purposes which the United States might unilaterally declare to be necessary or desirable. For example, a facility granted for operational use by the Strategic Air Command could not be turned into a U.S. training station for fighter aircraft or vice versa, without the express consent of the Canadian Government.

5. In my despatch under reference I suggested that we might be expected to contribute something more than property as our share of the common costs of any additional U.S. facilities in Canada. In recent discussions on NATO infrastructure (which the United States have stated should not necessarily set a precedent for all areas in NATO), the United States position has been that the host governments should provide land and public utilities, but that the remaining cost of constructing the facilities should be borne by the "user" governments. From the financial standpoint and with respect to defence facilities in Canada, this proposal would seem to be one which would cause us a minimum of hardship, particularly if the facilities in Canada are not operated on a joint basis.

6. As officials in the State Department may be expected to return to a discussion of the questions raised in this despatch it would be helpful to have your guidance.

IV. U.S. REQUEST FOR USE OF TORBAY AND GANDER IN AN EARLY EMERGENCY

17. The Minister of National Defence said that, at the meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence of May 7th - 11th, 1951, the U.S. Chairman had put forward a request of the U.S.A.F. for permission to use the Torbay and Gander airfields in the event of an early emergency. In such an emergency, the U.S.A.F. wished to use such capacity and facilities as the R.C.A.F. could make available at Torbay, and to use the facilities at Gander for the support of operations of the Military Air Transport Service.

The Canadian Chairman had informed the Board that he would take up the request with the Canadian government and recommend its approval. The Vice Chiefs of Staff Committee had now recommended acceptance of the U.S. request, subject to Canadian military and civilian requirements at the two fields being given first priority in an emergency and to such arrangements as might be made in that event, between the R.C.A.F. and the U.S.A.F., concerning the operation of U.S. aircraft at the fields.

18. The Acting Chief of the Air Staff said the U.S.A.F.'s purpose in making this request was to ascertain whether it could reasonably plan on being able to use some of the facilities at the two airfields in an early emergency, pending conclusion at a later date of arrangements between the two governments regarding U.S. use of these and other fields in north-eastern Canada.

19. The Prime Minister thought it inadvisable to give the U.S. authorities a written undertaking that they could have access to Torbay and Gander in an early emergency since the arrangement might be made public in the United States. It appeared sufficient to inform the U.S. authorities orally that, as the two countries were co-operating in the defence effort, it was considered that the U.S. authorities should be able to take it for granted that, in the event of an emergency, everything proper to meet it would be done.

20. The Committee, after further discussion, noted the report of the Minister of National Defence regarding a U.S. request for use of facilities at Torbay and Gander in an early emergency, and agreed that the U.S. authorities be informed orally that, as the two countries were co-operating in the defence effort, it was considered that the U.S. authorities should be able to take it for granted that, in the event of such an emergency, everything proper to meet it would be done.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL Washington, June 21, 1951

Dear Mr. Heeney:

As you know, we have been hoping to get through the State Department clarification of the further requests which might be expected from the United States Government for defence facilities in Canada. I am now able to report at least a partial clarification resulting from a conversation which Mr. R. Gordon Arneson had with General Walsh this week insofar as it concerns additional requirements which the United States Air Force will have for the use of the Strategic Air Command.

General Walsh told Mr. Arneson that the United States Air Force will require one base additional to the base at Goose Bay for the use of the Strategic Air Command, to be located in a site in Newfoundland. The reasons for this requirement were two. First, the U.S.A.F. wanted to have a base which would be easily accessible by water all the year round for the transport of the large quantities of gasoline required for S.A.C. operations. The base at Goose Bay, he pointed out, had the defect that for a large part of the year it was accessible only by air transport. The second reason was the large expansion of the United States Air Force now in train, which included the expansion of aircraft to be used by the Strategic Air Command, as well as the expansion in the number of special weapons to be used in these operations. Apparently it is the opinion of the U.S.A.F. that the facilities at Goose Bay will not be sufficient to accommodate this expansion.

General Walsh told Mr. Arneson that all he could say at this time was that it was the clear objective of the U.S.A.F. to seek one more base[57] from the Canadian Government, and to secure arrangements by negotiation which would enable the U.S.A.F. to use such a base for special weapons on the same conditions as applied at Goose Bay. Mr. Arneson was also told that the United States base at Harmon Field is apparently to be regarded as a supporting field to be used particularly for the storage of fuel and for fuel-carrying aircraft.

This requirement gives us a better position [A.D.P. Heeney].

I should mention that Mr. Arneson had promised Mr. MacKay when he was in Ottawa that he would get this information for him, but had been unable to have his conversation with General Walsh until this week.

UNITED STATES SURVEYS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

The Department has been informally advised by United States State Department officials that the United States wishes to develop another air base in Newfoundland in addition to Goose, the principal reason being that on the outbreak of war it would be quite impossible to handle expected traffic through existing airfields. Similar information has been conveyed through Service channels. The United States has already asked for permission to survey Torbay airport with a view to development. Permission has already been granted, and it is understood a survey is under way. Before making any definite proposals regarding Torbay, the U.S.A.F. wish, however, to make a reconnaissance survey of the Island for the purpose of finding potential sites and to conduct site surveys on promising sites, if any are found. They are not at present requesting permission to develop any site, but merely to make a survey to determine what site (Torbay or other) would be most feasible for development.

In order to eliminate unnecessary work in making a survey, the Department of Transport and the R.C.A.F. are prepared to make available to the U.S.A.F. any available data they may have regarding possible sites.

The survey has been approved by the Chiefs of Staff Committee and the Department of Transport subject to the following conditions:

(a) that the survey team should be nominally headed by an officer of the R.C.A.F. and that the Department of Transport be invited to have a representative participate and to provide such other assistance as that Department considers desirable;

(b) that copies of all results, including maps, survey data, photographs, etc., be made available to the Canadian Government through the R.C.A.F.;

(c) that permission of the Government of Newfoundland be obtained in advance.

Any necessary arrangements with the Government of Newfoundland or with private property owners would be made by the R.C.A.F. or the Department of Transport as may be appropriate.

It is recommended that permission be given to the United States Government for the U.S.A.F. to conduct surveys on the Island of Newfoundland, subject to the conditions noted above.[58]

UNITED STATES REQUEST FOR FACILITIES ON CANADIAN TERRITORY

Last April the Department of External Affairs received a note from the United States Government requesting the permission of the Canadian Government for the United States Air Force to carry out "exploratory discussions" with the appropriate Canadian authorities regarding a proposed lease of the airport at Torbay, Newfoundland. Subsequent informal discussions revealed that the proposal consisted of an extension of the airport for the purpose of offensive operations by the U.S. Strategic Air Command and the construction of certain installations at the airport for the use of and control of the U.S. It was suggested that the Canadian Government might grant the U.S. Government a twenty-year lease of the property.

2. Joint participation and close collaboration with the U.S. has long been the principle governing Canadian policy with respect to foreign military activities in Canada. The Ogdensburg Agreement of August, 1940, out of which grew the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, emphasized joint responsibilities, a theme which has dominated the work of the PJBD since its inception.[59] However, while Canada has always been generally willing to cooperate in matters of joint defence, and while, indeed, we are specifically committed under the Medium Term Plan to make facilities available to the U.S. Strategic Air Command, the Canadian Government has made it a central point of policy to resist any encroachment upon Canadian rights and sovereignty.

3. In formal reply to the note the Canadian Government suggested inter alia that consideration of this matter be undertaken by the PJBD at its next series of meetings. These meetings were begun on May 8th last and during the sessions General McNaughton, the Canadian Chairman of the Board, stated specifically that Canada would not consider a lease of this property and generally that leases, while we had inherited them in the very special circumstances of Newfoundland's entrance to Confederation, were no longer acceptable to Canada as a basis for U.S. development on Canadian territory.

[59] Voir Canada, Recueil des traités, 1940, N°. 14./See Canada, Treaty Series, 1940, No. 14.

4. No official communication has passed since the meeting of the Board in May. But our Embassy in Washington has had some informal discussions with the State Department; also the two services, the USAF and the RCAF, have been in touch with one another.

5. In the early stages of these discussions we hopefully suggested that perhaps the arrangements concluded by the U.S. with Iceland for the construction and operation of certain facilities in the latter country might be applicable to the proposed project in Canada. The Icelandic terms were:

(a) Iceland provided free only land, without local utilities.

(b) The U.S. assumed all construction and operating costs.

(c) The arrangement can be terminated on the recommendation of the NATO Council or, if agreement by the Council is not reached as a result of a review by NATO, by twelve months' notice by either government.

Iceland drove a surprisingly hard bargain with the U.S. in this transaction — a much harder one than Denmark could in respect of Greenland. The Greenland agreement lasts for the duration of the Treaty unless amended or cancelled by agreement between the two governments. The State Department has made it clear to us that the Icelandic terms do not set a desirable precedent for similar operations in Canada. In the informal Washington discussions the U.S. authorities have stated that while they understand our position on the question of a long-term lease, the alternative of a long-term "agreement", say for twenty years, granting the U.S. unrestricted "user rights" for military purposes would be as satisfactory. Such an agreement would be adequate to meet Congressional and military requirements.

6. It is not entirely clear what the difference is between this proposed agreement and a lease. Moreover, there is some doubt as to whether this approach is consistent in letter and spirit with principle No. 5 of the Joint Statement on Peacetime Co-operation between the U.S. and Canada dated February 12, 1947:

"As an underlying principle all co-operative arrangements will be without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory."[60]

In the United Kingdom, the United States has not been able to acquire any leases at all on airfields used by the USAF or even assured rights of occupancy. The Washington conversations have ben inconclusive and Mr. Wrong, last June 1st, asked for further guidance which to date has not been provided. It is apparent that the U.S. Government will, before long, officially approach the Canadian Government again to establish the terms under which Torbay or some alternative property may be made available to the Strategic Air Command.

7. In determining our attitude to U.S. plans in Northeast Canada we might examine some of the projects which have been undertaken by the U.S. in Canada and see what our arrangements have been in connection both with financing and terms of occupancy. It is emphasized that the following list of projects is not complete and only represents those which seem to be germane to the problem under consideration. These projects can be divided in two parts:

[60] Voir Canada, Recueil des traités, 1947, N°. 43./See Canada, Treaty Series, 1947, No. 43.

(a) Prewar and wartime projects.

(b) Postwar projects.

(a) Prewar and Wartime

8. Airfields. The first series of airfields built as a joint defence project was the Northwest Staging Route which included fifteen airfields. About one-half of these were built in 1942 and operated by Canada. There were also nine airstrips built along the Canal route by the U.S. At the end of the war apprehension was felt that the U.S. might claim postwar rights on the basis of the wartime expenditures on these airfields. Since Canada's exchange position was exceptionally favourable at the time it was agreed, in April 1944, to pay the U.S. approximately $77 million for airfields and other facilities in the North which had been provided by them.

9. Weather Stations. During the last war approximately sixty weather stations were established by U.S. forces, about one-third being abandoned before the end of the war. The remainder with the exception of one on Padloping Island (which is eventually to be transferred when Canadian manpower is available) were taken over by Canada and paid for out of the $77 million above mentioned.

(b) Postwar

10. Since the war Canada has resisted any proposals for military activity on Canadian soil by the U.S. alone. Canadian policy on defence collaboration is set out in the 36th Recommendation of the PJBD approved by both governments, annexed as Appendix A hereto.†

11. Loran Stations. Three of these are operated by the U.S. Coastguard in Newfoundland. They were established and paid for by the U.S. during the war as part of a chain on the Atlantic Coast. Since 1945, and more particularly during the past year, the U.S. has been anxious to transfer responsibility for them to Canada. At present they are paid for and controlled entirely by the United States.

12. Arctic Weather Stations. Five joint weather stations have been established in the Canadian Arctic. They have been financed and operated as follows:

(a) Canada and the U.S. have each supplied half the personnel for each station.

(b) Overall responsibility for each station has been vested in a Canadian civilian official in charge. All radio operators are Canadian.

(c) The Canadian Government has borne all pay and subsistence of Canadian personnel and provided all permanent installations.

(d) The U.S. has borne all other costs, including equipment fuel, Arctic supplies and most transport.

(e) All permanent installations and improvements, including those of adjacent air-strips have remained the property of Canada.

(f) The Canadian Government, having reserved the right to do so under the original terms of occupancy, intends to take over the manning of all stations in due course. Availability of manpower is the limiting factor.

There are three other stations which are under the sole control of the U.S. by reason of their location on leased bases at Stephenville, Fort Pepperrell, and Argentia (see para 14).

13. Radar Sites. The two Governments have agreed to undertake jointly the extension of a Continental Air Defence System. This extension will involve about thirty radar installations on Canadian soil. This question was considered by the PJBD in January 1951 and their recommendation was as follows:

(a) No installations on Canadian soil will have an exclusively foreign character.

(b) The Canadian Government will acquire all land for installations and will pay one-third of the cost of building and maintaining the stations.

(c) No leases are given to the U.S. but they are granted "rights of access".

(d) When the stations are no longer required (in the opinion of both Governments) all immovable equipment will remain the property of Canada.

(e) The system is jointly manned as a whole although not in respect of each separate station.

(f) Canada will take over the manning of as many stations as her reserve of trained operators permits.

(g) As many of the stations as possible will be physically constructed by Canada; in some cases this will be on U.S. account.

(h) As far as possible the stations which are to be built and manned by the U.S. will be those which are most remote from populated areas.

The Board's Recommendation has been approved by the President of the U.S. and by the Canadian Government.

14. Leased Bases. These are in a separate category and cannot be called joint projects. The rights enjoyed by U.S. Forces in these areas cannot be taken as an indication of the privileges which the Canadian Government is normally prepared to give to U.S. Forces. This point was made in May 1951 meeting of the PJBD. On the entry of Newfoundland into Confederation, Canada inherited the 99-year agreement signed by the U.K. and U.S. in 1941. This agreement provides for very considerable U.S. privileges on what is now Canadian soil. In view of the special circumstances surrounding the existence of these bases they are not considered relevant to the present U.S. request for facilities. Details are accordingly omitted.

15. Goose Bay. As part of the general revision of the Leased Bases Agreement it was recommended by the Canadian Section of the PJBD and agreed to by the Government that the U.S. be given a 20-year lease to areas within the Base at Goose Bay. At the time of the recommendation the U.S. wished to establish married quarters and permanent facilities but was unable under U.S. law to do so without definite tenure.

Command

16. At present U.S. operations in Newfoundland are commanded by a Commanding General with headquarters at Fort Pepperrell, St. John's. Highest ranking RCAF officer in Newfoundland is a Wing Commander.

Conclusions

17. It seems clear that any arrangements which Canada enters into with the U.S. for extension of Torbay, or similar projects, must be along the lines of those concluded in the post-war period rather than in the pre-war and wartime periods.

18. For political reasons (including relationships not only with the U.S. but with the Provincial Government) it is also apparent that the Canadian command structure in Northeast Canada must be designed to exercise as much control as possible over U.S. activities.

19. In simplest terms, Canada's interests lie in maintaining the maximum degree of sovereignty and control and the shortest term of occupancy for the minimum financial contribution to construction and operation. By the special nature of the proposed activities it appears inevitable that the United States will demand a greater degree of control than in previous post-war joint projects and also a longer term of occupancy in one form or another.

20. It seems logical to assume that the higher Canada's contribution to the cost of the installations is, the stronger will be her position in resisting these demands.

21. Selection of any formula for cost sharing is bound to be somewhat arbitrary and in this light the following alternatives are suggested:

(a) Canada to provide only the land and possibly also local utilities supporting this approach by the Icelandic and Danish examples, also by the "user principle" for cost-sharing of European airfield infrastructure which the U.S. is pressing in NATO.

(b) Canada to assume the full cost of the project and the United States to amortize over a period to be determined on a basis of the period of continuing value of the facilities.

(c) The United States to assume full cost (including or excluding cost of land and local utilities) and Canada to amortize up to say one-third the total cost over a period of:

(i) 10 years, or

(ii) the life of the Treaty.

(d) Canada and the United States to share the cost on some mutually agreed basis such as that reached in the case of Radar Sites (see paragraph 13(b)).

(N.B. The division of costs arrived at for the Radar Sites was based on degree of use; the identical criterion would not be applicable here).

This could involve Canada in one third of about $80 million for Torbay. A very rough estimate by the RCAF of total expenditures covering proposed extensions at Torbay as well as at Frobisher, Goose Bay and Gander is $150 million. Thus over a period of about two years Canada's share on this basis could be approximately $50 million. It should be remembered that all these facilities will be of use to Canada not only in the future but at present for Air Defence, Coastal Command, and in some cases commercial purposes. Moreover, Frobisher will be useful for supplying the more remote bases in the Far North.

22. There seems no reason why, in the matter of tenure, we should not adopt the position already successfully taken by Iceland and the U.K., that is, to offer no fixed tenure, at all but merely to grant "user rights" for as long as both governments consider this to be necessary. There is reason to believe the U.S. badly needs these facilities and might consequently accept conditions more favourable from Canada's point of view than heretofore. Even if we were ultimately forced to retreat from this position, we might, if our original stand is firm enough, strike some sort of a bargain in modifying the terms of the Leased Bases Agreement.

Recommendations

23. (a) Canada and the United States should share the cost of the project on the basis of United States two-thirds, Canada one-third.

(b) Canada should grant "user rights" for as long as both governments agree that the arrangement is necessary.

(c) Canada should form a command organization which would place an RCAF officer in ultimate command of all air bases on Canadian soil including those solely occupied by U.S. Forces.[61]

SECRET Ottawa, July 20, 1951

Dear Dr. MacKay:

I told you that I would write you about the paper that you and Mr. Griffin prepared on the United States request for facilities in Canadian territory, having in mind particularly requirements at Torbay.[62] Anything I say here, I must emphasize, is my own view, as I have not been able to discuss it with the Minister, Dr. Clark, or Mr. Deutsch, all of whom are, of course, interested.

The main point I should like to make is that I feel we should not undertake substantial capital expenditures simply for the purpose of getting a nominal command of a base, or for getting a nominal right to terminate "user rights", to be given to the United States in lieu of a lease. It seems to me that the question of command must depend on whether Canada is furnishing an appreciable fraction, at least, of the manpower employed in and around the base in question. If the base is entirely, or almost entirely, for U.S. needs and manned by U.S. personnel, it seems to me that it is almost certainly going to be under U.S. command in substance and probably in theory, and that there is little to be gained by our undertaking substantial costs of construction on it. On the other hand, if the base is primarily a Canadian airport or a Canadian base, such as Gander and Goose are, then I think we can and should be in command, and that if it is necessary for us to assume some share of capital costs to clinch this, we should be prepared to do so. Undoubtedly there will be cases shading in between these two clear-cut extremes, and we will have to use judgment in deciding what is sensible in such cases, but broadly speaking, my own feeling, perhaps naturally since I am in the Treasury, is that it is not worth while making substantial capital expenditures, nor undertaking more or less artificial operational responsibilities, in order to get nominal command.

In regard to "user rights", we should, I think, try to have them limited in so far as possible in theory, and no doubt in this case the Americans will be sufficiently desirous of getting bases that they will be prepared to accept some limitation. However, it seems to me that it is not worth while our paying any substantial amount in capital costs in order to secure such limitations on "user rights", as I do not believe that in fact we will feel prepared to exercise any restrictions on them if they are within our powers. Moreover, I think the existence of such restrictions and our rights to exercise them are not likely to be understood to any marked degree by the Canadian public, and from a political point of view, are hardly likely to be worth the expenditure of many millions of dollars. I would think instead that some fuzziness of formula might well be used to obscure the extent to which we have in fact granted the Americans the equivalent of a long-term lease.

There are, of course, political issues in this of which I am perhaps a poor judge. Nevertheless it seems to me that in this day and age we have to recognize unpalatable realities, one of which is that for better or for worse we must throw in our lot with the United States and recognize the need for her to have strategic bases from which to deploy the power on which our safety as well as theirs seems now to rest.

I am asking to have this paper and a copy of this letter passed on to Mr. Armstrong and Mr. Deutsch when they return to Ottawa around the end of this month.

Yours truly,

U.S. REQUEST FOR FACILITIES

I am returning Bryce's letter.

This is a very reasonable statement from the Treasury point of view and there is no doubt that some of the argument is incontestable. All the same I stick to my original position that, very generally, our control over the situation and our ability to limit the tenure will largely be measured by what we contribute to capital and maintenance costs. I agree with Bryce on the subject of "nominal command". But it is not "nominal" command we are concerned with; it is actual command based, as Bryce himself has put it, on "Canada ... furnishing an appreciable fraction ... of the manpower employed ...". My understanding is that SAC will need some squadrons of fighter cover.[63] If this is the case and if we were to provide them, would not that be "an appreciable fraction of the manpower employed"?

2. Bryce's argument that the Canadian public are not likely to understand the question of restrictions over U.S. tenure, etc., and the expenditure of public money on ensuring them is a rather hard one to shoot down because dollars and cents are competing with the somewhat abstract question of long term political relationships. Nevertheless, if it is the military decision (and preferably a NATO decision) that a number of fighter squadrons must be stationed in Northeast Canada, would the Canadian public really feel that it was up to the U.S. to provide them while we send all our squadrons over to Europe? Would it not be more acceptable politically (if not to the RCAF!) to look after as much of what NATO decides are the minimum defense requirements of this country ourselves? The integrated force loses nothing by Canada furnishing requirements in Canada and releasing U.S. squadrons for Europe.

3. There is no quarrel at all with Bryce's penultimate paragraph. This is recognized in Principle No. 5 of the Joint Statement of Feb. 12, 1947.

4. What is the next move? Does the paper or a revision thereof go to sub-panel or do we thrash the question out further intradepartmentally?[64]

REVISION OF JOINT (U.S.-CANADA) STATEMENT ON DEFENCE, 1947[66]

When the Minister was in Washington early in June he raised with Mr. Acheson the question as to whether it would not be desirable to have the Joint Statement of 1947 revised.[67] Mr. Acheson agreed. We have had an enquiry from the State Department as to whether we propose to bring up the question of revision at the PJBD meeting the third week of August.

2. I have discussed the matter with General McNaughton. We both feel that to attempt a revision at this time might not be wise. Although the Joint Statement antedated both the accession of Newfoundland and the North Atlantic Treaty, which raises new problems with regard to U.S. facilities in Canada, the statement still, I think provides us with a fairly firm basis of principle to protect Canadian sovereignty. In fact we have not perhaps insisted on the letter of the Joint Statement ourselves in some cases; e.g., the promise of a lease for areas in Goose Bay, and the Radar Agreement which will permit U.S. command of radar stations until they are taken over by Canada.

3. One serious objection to proceeding with a revision at this time is that the Government has not come to any decision on policy with regard to:

(a) Command for defence of the Newfoundland - Northeast area of Canada;

(b) whether, if new sites are granted the U.S. in this area, the sites are to be under Canadian command; or

(c) whether any contribution should be made to new sites to be developed in the area. (A list of outstanding or anticipated requests is appended.)

In view of these circumstances I am inclined to feel it would be premature to proceed with a revision of the Joint Statement of 1947 just at this time.[68] The Minister may, however, think the time appropriate, and he may have some views as to how the Statement should be revised. You may wish to have a word with him. If the PJBD is to consider the matter at its next meeting, it will be necessary to notify the U.S. members promptly.

OUTSTANDING AND ANTICIPATED REQUESTS FOR U.S. DEFENCE FACILITIES IN CANADA

1. Goose Bay — We have agreed to a twenty-year lease to an area or areas within the Base, but completion is being held up pending agreement between the USAF and the RCAF on metes and bounds. There is no reason to anticipate difficulty in reaching agreement.

2. Request for three global communication sites in Newfoundland — These would be tenant stations of existing bases but the U.S. contend that these communication facilities must be outside the bases in order to avoid interference with reception. We have received a hint that a request for further sites in Newfoundland may be forthcoming.

[68] Note marginale :/Marginal note:

3. Two radar sites in the Northern Arctic, which would be part of the Greenland chain rather than part of the chain projecting the recent radar agreement.

4. Request for air gunnery range in Lake Erie — The Province of Ontario and the Department of Fisheries are averse to granting this request lest it interfere with fishing activities, but they have been asked to reconsider in the light of additional information.

5. Request for the large-scale development of Torbay or an alternative field in Newfoundland is almost certain to be forthcoming as soon as surveys now underway are completed.

6. Request for our consent in advance to the evacuation of civilians down the Alaska Highway in the event of emergency — The note covering this request is not very clear but seems to imply advance provision of facilities for accommodating evacuees, including probably the stationing of some personnel along the Highway.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL Washington, September 20, 1951

Dear Arnold [Heeney]:

The long delay in answering your letter of July 30th† on the question of a possible new deal with the United States covering their defence installations in Northeastern Canada is explained by the fact that it arrived after I had gone on leave and has only recently come to my attention. We have given the matter a good deal of consideration here. As you said in your letter, the main question is whether we hold sufficiently strong cards to make it practicable to re-open such issues as the length of the leases of the Newfoundland bases and the conditions which we have already undertaken to accept at Goose Bay. If there is little chance that we could persuade the Administration to consider a substantial modification of these arrangements, to put forward a comprehensive plan on the lines proposed in MacKay's memorandum would only cause irritation.

Our point of view reflects the best guess that we can make of how such a scheme would be received; this guess is based on past experience in the negotiations over the Newfoundland bases after the union of Newfoundland with Canada, and on the many other discussions of the last two or three years dealing with the use of U.S. forces of facilities in Canadian territory.

My judgment, in which Messrs. Matthews, Ignatieff, and Towe concur, is that we would have to pay altogether too high a price to secure the concurrence of the United States in an agreement covering all the defence installations in Canadian territory which they already have or desire to establish. The price would involve the granting by us of terms at the new installations, such as Torbay or a comparable airport, which would be more difficult to explain satisfactorily to the Canadian public than the continuance unchanged of the 99-year tenure at the leased bases and of the arrangements agreed for Goose Bay. We think, therefore, that we should concentrate on securing satisfactory conditions at other installations in Canada where the U.S. may be the sole user or may share the use with the Canadian forces. In short, it seems to us politic to separate as far as possible from the other issues matters concerning the leased bases and the arrangements at Goose Bay, and to concentrate on arranging that additional U.S. requests should be granted only on terms that meet our wishes and are related to the general pattern of bilateral agreements between NATO countries for the use of defence facilities.

The principles at which we might aim can be summarized as follows:

1. Conditions of Tenure:

(a) The agreements should cover the specific use of facilities and not the lease of territory;

(b) The agreements should be for a limited duration, say the duration of the North Atlantic Treaty, and we should aim, at least as a maximum objective, at the inclusion of a right to terminate (or cancel) the agreement at any time during the original period at the request of either party;

(c) User rights and facilities granted by Canada to the United States should be spelt out in the agreements and no general ceding of rights should be provided;

(d) In the case of joint use of facilities, Canada should have the right to take over the full control and operation of any facility;

(e) When facilities are to be jointly used by Canada and the U.S., there should be an obligation upon the United States to pay its share of the maintenance cost during the period of the agreement;

(f) In the case of facilities for U.S. use only, agreements should automatically lapse in respect of any individual facility if during the period of the agreement the U.S. ceases to maintain the facility in operation.

2. Immunities and Privileges:

Immunities and privileges granted to U.S. personnel under all new defence agreements should conform to a standard agreement applicable throughout Canada. The NATO Forces Agreement of 1951, plus perhaps assurances covering post exchanges and service clubs, provides such a basis.

3. Financial Arrangements:

(a) When user rights are granted by Canada for the exclusive use of the United States, the United States should provide all the funds, although the Canadian Government should furnish the land.

(b) In defence agreements providing for joint use of the defence facilities, ad hoc arrangements should be made to share the cost.

(c) Upon termination of the application of an agreement relating to a facility for the exclusive use of the United States, the United States should have a right to remove any movable installations. Anything remaining should become the property of the Canadian Government without cost. In the event of termination of an agreement by cancellation on Canadian initiative, some special provision will presumably have to be made by Canada to provide the United States reasonable compensation for the installations.

The chief point of contention if we put forward proposals of this nature would be the suggestion that agreements incorporating them could be terminated at any time by either party. This would be likely to bring forth the usual arguments that Congress would not provide the funds without some assurance of security of tenure, and there would certainly be some substance in these arguments. I think, however, that this is a good position from which to begin. Indeed, if we took this stand and stuck to it vigorously, there might be a chance, though perhaps a remote one, that we could extract concessions involving changes in the leased-bases agreement as the price for modifying our position. There are, or course, a number of intermediate stages between an agreement which can be unilaterally terminated at any time and one that is firm for twenty years unless both parties concur in this termination or modification. There is a good deal to be said, at any rate as a negotiating technique, for starting at the suggested position even if we have to give quite a lot of ground later on.[69]

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

VIII. ADDITIONAL FACILITIES FOR U.S.A.F. AT TORBAY; POSITION OF T.C.A. AT KINROSS FIELD, MICH.

38. The Minister of National Defence, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, said that on December 3rd the U.S. government had asked permission for the U.S.A.F. to obtain, by short-term lease from the Department of Transport, use of an additional 22 buildings at Torbay airport, Newfoundland. The proposal was to use these initially to house an aircraft control and warning unit and, later, for the expanding U.S.A.F. general depot at the field.

He outlined various considerations involved in this request. The Departments of External Affairs, National Defence and Transport had recommended that, subject to certain conditions, the U.S.A.F. be permitted to use 19 of the buildings in question for the temporary housing of the radar unit mentioned.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, Dec. 10th, 1951, U.S. request for further facilities at Torbay Airport — Cab. Doc. D-321)†

39. The Chief of the Air Staff stated that, whatever the outcome of its surveys at Torbay and elsewhere in Newfoundland, discussed at the meetings of April 17th and June 29th, 1951, the U.S.A.F. was expected to wish to use the 19 buildings, when later evacuated by the radar unit, for the extension of its present supply depot.

40. The Minister of Transport felt it should be recognized that, as a result of piecemeal requests for facilities at Torbay, Resolute Bay and elsewhere, the U.S.A.F. was gradually becoming, or likely to become, the chief occupant of a number of airfields in Canada on a semi-permanent basis. If the radar unit were admitted to Torbay, as proposed, there would be about 700 U.S. servicemen there and it would be difficult for a civilian department to explain how that total had gradually been reached. He thought that operation of the field should now pass from his department to the R.C.A.F.

It appeared unwise to permit the radar unit to use Torbay until a case involving U.S.A.F. interference with Trans-Canada Air Lines rights was cleared up. By international agreement the U.S. government had accorded Canada an important civil air route between Winnipeg and Toronto, via Kinross Field, Michigan and T.C.A., which has been designated for the operation of this route, had developed terminal facilities at Kinross Field. Recently, however, the U.S.A.F. had taken steps to occupy the field and expected T.C.A. to move its facilities. Representations had been made by his department to the U.S. Civil Air Attaché in Ottawa without result to date.

41. Air Marshal Curtis said that it was inevitable for an expanding force like the U.S.A.F. to request facilities piecemeal in Canada. He agreed that it would probably be desirable for the R.C.A.F. to take over operation of Torbay.

42. Mr. Claxton felt that, if this were done, landlord-tenant relationships at Torbay would be made easier.

43. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee said that the U.S.A.F.'s present estimate of its additional requirements in Canada in 1952 had now been received and would be made available to the Committee after examination.

He had been assured by the Chairman, U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, that General Vandenberg, Chief of Staff, U.S.A.F. would be glad to settle any cases of U.S.A.F. interference with Canadian activities. He was, therefore confident that Air Marshal Curtis could, if desired, obtain from General Vandenberg a satisfactory solution of the problem that had arisen regarding Kinross Field.

44. The Minister of Defence Production suggested that the proposed temporary lease at Torbay be approved subject to satisfactory arrangements being made to resolve the problem arising from U.S.A.F. interference with the position of Trans-Canada Air Lines at Kinross Field.

45. The Committee, after further discussion, noted the report of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, regarding additional facilities desired by the U.S.A.F. at Torbay airport, Newfoundland, and agreed that:

(1) the U.S. government be informed that, subject to satisfactory arrangements being made to resolve the problem arising from U.S.A.F. interference with the position of Trans-Canada Air Lines at Kinross Field, Michigan:

(a) 19 buildings (not including Nos. 2, 25 and 26) at Torbay may be used by the U.S.A.F. for temporary accommodation of an aircraft control and warning unit ultimately to be posted elsewhere, although no commitment can be made, pending further study, regarding use of these buildings by other troops;

(b) the U.S.A.F. may negotiate with the Department of Transport a lease covering these buildings, valid for one year, terminable on 30 days' notice and providing for payment to the Department of Transport for services it makes available;

(c) this arrangement does not alter the character or functions of the civil airport under the control of the Canadian authorities, or affect the freedom of access and operation of civil operators or civilians with legitimate business at the field.

(2) the question of transferring responsibility for operation of Torbay airport from the Department of Transport to the Department of National Defence be further considered at a subsequent meeting after study by these departments.

Note de la Direction économique pour le chef de la Direction économique

Memorandum from Economic Division to Head, Economic Division

[Ottawa], January 5, 1952

KINROSS AIRPORT

I am glad to say that our meeting in Washington on the Kinross problem turned out as well as we could have anticipated.

2. The Canadian party comprised A.S. McDonald of the Air Transport Board; E. Hickson, Department of Transport; F.T. Wood, TCA, and myself. We were met by a large group of United States Air Force and State Department officials — about 18 in all. It was soon clear that they had very little idea of what the problem was at Kinross but they were most conciliatory in attitude and were obviously anxious to find out what was troubling us.

3. The meeting was chaired by Colonel Ray of the United States Air Force. Colonel Bristor, United States Army Engineers, who will be in charge of the construction work at Kinross, was present. The Canadian case was presented for the most part by McDonald. The presence of a representative of TCA was useful, and for myself, I was able to give McDonald some help before and during the meeting.

4. We had two main complaints to register. The most important of these was that certain conditions laid down by the USAF for TCA's continued use of Kinross imposed limitations on rights we held under the Canada-United States Bilateral Air Agreement of 1949, and were in fact inconsistent with the terms of the Agreement. The USAF proposed to issue a licence to TCA which would constitute permission for the company to continue using the airport. A copy of their licence had been sent to TCA just before Christmas. One of its terms was that the licence would be revocable at will by the Secretary of the Air Force. Another empowered the officer commanding at Kinross to limit the number of TCA's flights into and out of the airport. On both of these counts the licence was unacceptable to us. TCA's right to use the airport is covered by the Canada-United States Bilateral Agreement, and the same Agreement sets out the basis on which the frequency of flights is to be determined. While we would not object to the USAF licencing TCA to use Kinross after it became their field, we would have to insist that their licence be consistent with the terms of the Bilateral Agreement.

5. The United States officials readily admitted the validity of our objections on this point. The Air Force said that their only wish was to establish their right to limit civil aviation activity at Kinross in the event of an emergency; subject to that condition they were willing to re-draft the licence to meet our objections. We said that when we objected to the licence in its present form we were thinking only of operations by TCA under normal peacetime conditions.

6. Our second objection was to the USAF demand that TCA and Capital Airlines remove their buildings and facilities from their present location to another part of the field, and also that they remove a set of runway lights which had been installed at Canadian Government expense. We had two points to make in this connection:

(1) that United States carriers had not been put to any similar expense at Canadian airports, but at most places had been provided with what space they required at reasonable rentals in buildings provided by the Canadian Government;

(2) that something like $50,000 of Canadian Government funds had been spent on maintenance and operation of the airport during the past five years. This would result in a saving for the USAF of a considerable amount they would have otherwise had to spend in restoring the airport to serviceability.

Our position was simply that since the USAF were the party which required the buildings and facilities to be moved, the USAF should pay for the move and be responsible for re-establishing buildings and facilities on the new site. Otherwise, TCA would be put to considerable unnecessary expense.

7. The Chairman of the meeting said at once that he thought our views on this matter were most reasonable whereupon all present agreed with surprisingly little discussion. The United States Air Force said that they had no authority to make a definite commitment but that they would seek an appropriation at once to cover the move. This was as fair an offer as we could have wished for, and so after checking with the TCA representative in our group, we said that TCA would be quite ready to pay a reasonable rental for the buildings and the new facilities if they were to be provided by the USAF. (TCA could do this without increasing their expenses at Kinross because the USAF's charges for landing fees at the airport will be much less than those now in effect there).

8. By the end of the meeting I was satisfied that our problem at Kinross had occurred simply because lower formations of the USAF had applied, there, routine procedures for taking over civil airfields in the United States. When USAF headquarters realized that a foreign air carrier and an international agreement were involved, they were willing to consider special arrangements. However, I imagine that the stand we have taken on Torbay had a lot to do with the speed with which they moved to satisfy us.

9. After the meeting Colonel Ray spoke to me about Torbay. He said that the USAF have abandoned certain plans they had made for stationing operating squadrons there and he thought that their plans for a General Depot would be reduced. However, he was extremely anxious to move to Torbay as soon as possible the personnel of the Aircraft Control and Warning Unit which has been scheduled to go there. This unit is at present not being employed and has been waiting since December 1st last for its orders to move. The USAF would require for this unit most of the buildings they have asked for. I thanked Colonel Ray for the way that he and his officers had met us on the Kinross question and said that we would do all we could to hasten an answer on the question of facilities at Torbay.

10. Before this meeting took place the position on Torbay was that the Minister had written to Mr. Chevrier suggesting that in view of the representations we had made to the United States on the subject of Kinross, we might let the United States Embassy have the reply we had prepared to their request for facilities at Torbay. Our reply would agree to the immediate provision of the facilities most urgently needed. Mr. Chevrier is now away on two weeks' holidays, but before he left he told Baldwin that he would be agreeable to our releasing the reply provided that the meeting on Kinross was "satisfactory". Baldwin is himself away at present but he will be back on the morning of January 18th. I will try to see him then, with McDonald of the Air Transport Board and probably Phillips of Defence Liaison. I should think that he will be satisfied by what we have to tell him about the meeting.

11. On the day previous to the meeting in Washington McDonald and I saw Matthews and Towe at the Embassy to give them the story on Kinross as it stood then. Towe was present with us at the meeting the following day.[70]

BASIC PROVISIONS FOR CANADA-U.S. COLLABORATION ON DEFENCE IN THE NORTHEASTERN AREAS OF CANADA

At a meeting held on Tuesday and Wednesday, February 20th and 21st, 1951 between Major General Lyman P. Whitten, commanding United States North Eastern Command, Captain D.G. Donaho, United States Navy, commanding United States Naval Base, Argentia, Colonel M.A. Preston, Chief of Staff of General Whitten, the members of the Joint Services Committee East Coast and the members of the Joint Services Committee Newfoundland and attended by Commodore R.E.S. Bidwell, R.C.N. and Colonel C.H. Cook of National Defence Headquarters, it was agreed the planning should be commenced between the relevant Canadian authorities and the Commanding General North East Command for the defence of the north eastern areas of Canada.

In order to provide a basis for such planning, a paper was prepared and approved entitled "Basic Provisions for Canada-United States Collaboration of Defence in the North Eastern Areas of Canada". It is intended that this paper shall form the terms of reference for those officers detailed to produce the proposed plan. A copy of this paper is attached herewith for the approval of the Chiefs of Staffs' Committee. It is understood that General Whitten is also forwarding a copy to the Joint Chiefs of Staff in Washington.

It should be noted that Section III entitled "Defence Against Air Attack" is beyond the terms of reference of the Joint Services Committee East Coast to complete as no representatives of the Royal Canadian Air Force Air Defence Group were available for consultation. It is therefore requested that Royal Canadian Air Force Air Defence Group may be invited to complete this Section of the paper in collaboration with the United States North Eastern Command.

On completion of this paper it will be submitted to the Chiefs of Staffs' Committee for their consideration.

BASIC PROVISIONS FOR CANADA-U.S. COLLABORATION ON DEFENCE IN THE NORTHEASTERN AREAS OF CANADA

SECTION I

Purpose

1. To effect an apportionment of defence undertakings in the Northeastern areas of Canada between the U.S. and Canada in order that the two nations may conduct their defence planning and programming concerning these areas on a basis which ensures that all defence requirements receive consideration with a minimum of duplicative effort.

2. To define the responsibilities and prerogatives, vis-à-vis one another, of the commanders of the forces of the two countries operating in these areas to ensure the required co-ordination, prevent misunderstanding, and assure the greatest combined effectiveness.

3. To establish procedures for co-ordination of effort.

SECTION II

GENERAL

4. In this section are listed all provisions of general application to all defence undertakings. These provisions form a common basis for each of the subsequent sections of this document dealing with specialized defence fields.

5. Certain terms, susceptible to varying interpretation as to meaning and scope are defined as follows:

Area (General) Defence: non-localized defence; not pertaining to the defence of a point, a base, or an individual facility; pertaining, instead, to a large area in which there may be a number of bases or other facilities. Defence which is activated by the enemy's existence, or imminent existence, in an area regardless of the enemy's possible intent to attack a particular facility in that area.

Area (General) Defence Means, Area (General) Defence Forces: Means or Forces deployed for the purpose of defeating, destroying or dislodging an enemy from an area, or contesting his entrance, into, passage through or operations in the area, regardless of the enemy's specific objective. (Example: Interceptor Fighters).

Local Defence: Defence undertaken for the purpose of protecting an individual point, base, or other facility.

Local Defence Means or Forces: Means or forces deployed for the defence of a specific facility. (Example AAA)

Internal Security: Pertains to defence against internal uprising, sabotage, subversion or covert action; pertains to defence against action originating from within, or to action which, if originating from without, takes a form not recognised under international law as action by military forces.

External Security, External Defence: Pertains to defence against all forms of armed action by military forces.

Air Defence: Pertains to all measures undertaken to minimize the effect of air attack, including combatant and non-combatant measures, pre-raid and post-raid measures, active and passive measures.

Northeast Approaches: That part of Canada which includes Newfoundland, Labrador and the Canadian Northwest Territories, but excludes the Canadian Maritimes and the St. Lawrence Valley.

6. Canada will assume sole responsibility for the Local Defence of facilities of purely Canadian concern.

7. The U.S. will assume sole responsibility for the Local Defence of facilities occupied by the U.S. under the terms of the Leased Bases Agreement (i.e. 99 year leased bases).

8. The U.S. will assume sole responsibility for the Local Defence of facilities (such a radar, communications, and weather facilities) operated by the U.S.

9. Canada will assume sole responsibility for the Local Defence of facilities operated by Canada.

10. Canada will assume primary responsibility for the external defence of facilities which are jointly occupied or operated (by Canada and U.S.), and the U.S. may, by agreement of local Commanders, make provisions, and augment the forces made available for the defence of those facilities.

11. The nation with sole responsibility in any defence task as enumerated above, will control the forces and the effort devoted thereto. In cases of facilities jointly operated, the control of the forces allocated to their defence will be exercised by Canada unless the control of such forces is vested in the United States by prior agreement.

12. Each nation, in planning, programming and implementing its defence undertakings will keep the other continuously informed.

SECTION III

DEFENCE AGAINST AIR ATTACK

13. The provisions of Section II apply to the field of defence treated herein (Defence against Air Attack) and to all other fields of defence. Those provisions contained in this section are especially applicable, or exclusively applicable to Defence against Air Attack.

14. The U.S. will assume the responsibility for the fighter defence of bases operated by the U.S. in the Northeast, either unilaterally or jointly with Canada. Incidental to this responsibility, the U.S. will conduct the Area Defence of the Newfoundland/Labrador area and the Northeast Approaches to the U.S. and Canada against attack by air except as provided in paragraph 17 below.

15. Canada may share responsibility for the Area Defence of the Newfoundland-Labrador area against air attack and may make provisions, and augment the forces made available by the U.S. for the air defence of this area.

16. The U.S. will establish and operate AC & W radar at Pepperrell, Harmon and Goose Bay (and at Frobisher Bay at U.S. discretion).

17. Canada and the U.S. will provide jointly for the establishment and operation of AC & W radar required elsewhere in Canada for the defence of the Northeast and the Northeast approaches to Canada and the U.S.

18. The over-all AC & W system in the Northeast will be operated under U.S. direction and control in accordance with commonly accepted doctrine and practices concerning AC & W.

19. Control and direction of the over-all Area Air Defence system (fighters and AC&W) will pass to Canada at such time as Canada desires to assume control and is prepared to provide the greater portion of the Area Air Defence means.

SECTION IV

DEFENCE AGAINST ARMED ATTACK DELIVERED ON THE GROUND

20. The provisions of Section II apply to the field of defence treated herein (Defence against Ground Attack) and to all other fields of defence. Those provisions contained in this section are especially applicable, or exclusively applicable to Defence against Ground Attack.

21. Canada will assume primary responsibility for area defence. The U.S. may, by agreement of local Commanders, augment the Canadian forces made available for this purpose.

22. The U.S. acting in the defence of its facilities, may proceed, as the situation requires, beyond the bounds of the U.S. areas. If, however, as a result of this action, a requirement arises for co-ordination of Canadian and U.S. military effort, Canada will have the prerogative of directing the co-ordinated action.

SECTION V

DEFENCE OF SHORE FACILITIES AGAINST ATTACK BY SEA-GOING VESSELS

23. The provisions of Section II apply to the field of defence treated herein (Defence against Sea-Going Vessels) and to all other fields of defence. Those provisions contained in this section are especially applicable, or exclusively applicable, to defence against Sea-Going Vessels.

24. Canada will have primary responsibility for area defence. The U.S. may, by agreement of local Commanders, make provisions and augment the Canadian forces made available for this purpose.

25. Canada will defend the harbour of St. John's, including the U.S. Docks therein, the facilities at Goose Bay and the approaches thereto, and other jointly operated facilities.

26. The U.S. will defend Argentia harbour and the approaches thereto and provide local defence at McAndrew, Harmon and Pepperrell.

SECTION VI

INTERNAL SECURITY

27. Each nation will be responsible for measures to insure against acts of sabotage and subversion on the part of personnel in the military service of that nation or employed by that nation.

28. At facilities jointly operated and divided into Canadian and U.S. sectors (as at Goose Bay) each nation will assume sole responsibility for internal security measures to be taken within their individual areas.

29. Canada will assume primary responsibility for internal security measures entailing action in Canada beyond the bounds of facilities operated by the U.S. or by Canada-U.S. jointly.

30. At facilities, jointly operated but not sub-divided internationally (as at certain weather and electronic facilities) Canada will assume primary responsibility for internal security.

31. The U.S., in dealing with internal security matters requiring action extending beyond the limits of U.S. operated facilities or affecting Canadian nationals not in the U.S. employ or pertaining to Canadian nationals in U.S. employ but entailing action beyond US authority, will co-ordinate their action with the RCMP. Contact with the RCMP for this purpose will be made through Canadian military authorities unless otherwise arranged with the concurrence of the latter.

32. Each nation will keep the other informed of all action, prospective action, conditions, investigations, suspected conditions or personnel which might affect the security of facilities of the other against sabotage or covert action.

Memorandum from Head, Defence Liaison (1) Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET Ottawa, March 27, 1951

AIR COMMAND NEWFOUNDLAND AREA

At a meeting in A/V/M James' office on Thursday, March 22, with General Whitten the question of air command of the Newfoundland area was discussed. It will be recalled that the title, the United States Northeast Command, was agreed to some months ago by the Canadian Government on the understanding that the Command was administrative rather than operational. The situation, however, is changing radically in view of the speeding up of defence arrangements in the North Atlantic area. While the Newfoundland area is primarily a staging area between the United States and Europe, the area has become more of a target area and will require substantial defences, especially for various staging fields.

2. General Whitten now operates directly under the Joint Chiefs of Staff, that is, he has his own command, and his instructions require him to defend U.S. installations under his command. His chain of command for this purpose is directly back to Washington.

3. The area constitutes the outer defences of Central Canada as well as of the Northeastern United States. For the air defence of Canada it is essential that the command should be direct through Eastern Air Command (Montreal) rather than through New York or Washington and back to Montreal.

4. It was pointed out in the discussion that while NAORPG had become the North Atlantic Command, and the European Planning Groups have now become SCAPE, no such change has taken place with respect to CUSRPG. It was suggested that even if no command structure of the whole Canada-U.S. region were feasible, a Northeast Air Command might be separately established by agreement between Canada and the United States Air Commander for defence of the Newfoundland area, this authority, in so far as relations with Canadian personnel or civilians is concerned, to be exercised by a Canadian officer on his staff. It was also suggested that a fighter squadron or squadrons of the RCAF might be put under his command, especially if Torbay were developed as proposed (see note on Torbay of March 22).[71]

5. This proposal, although still in rather a shadowy form, strikes me as sensible. Clearly, we cannot afford to duplicate forces in the Newfoundland area; on the other hand, we cannot afford to leave responsibility for the defence of the area to the United States by default.

6. It is probable that the question of command will be raised at the next meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.[72] the U.S. and Canada against attack by air except as provided in paragraph 17 below." (i.e., joint Canada-U.S. radar defence arrangements).

Paragraph 15 provides that "Canada may share responsibility for the Area Defence of the Newfoundland-Labrador area against air attack and may make provisions, and augment the forces made available by the U.S. for the air defence of this area."

Paragraph 19 provides that "Control and direction of the over-all Area Air Defence system (fighters and AC&W) will pass to Canada at such time as Canada desires to assume control and is prepared to provide the greater portion of the Area Air Defence means."

Comment: These provisions would appear to give the U.S. responsibility for area air defence as if it were in effect a part of the U.S. except that control may be passed to Canada if and when Canada is prepared to accept the responsibility and can provide the major share of defence forces. This is clearly contrary to the principle that Canada insisted on during the past war, namely, that responsibility for defence of Canadian territory was vested in Canada.

As I understand it, the RCAF view is as follows: The establishment of U.S. bases in the Newfoundland-Labrador area makes it a target area of considerable importance, thereby enhancing the problem of defence; the RCAF does not anticipate having sufficient fighter defence forces to assume the whole burden for defence of the area; the RCAF proposal is that a Northeast Air Defence Command be established jointly by Canada and the U.S. under CUSRPG, and that this command be exercised by the local U.S. Air Commander; that Canada provide certain squadrons to operate under his command; that, for purposes of air defence, the Northeast Air Commander report to Canadian Air Command at Montreal; e.g., that the Northeast Air Defence Command should be for operational purposes a part of the air defence of Canada.

TOP SECRET [Ottawa] August 28, 1951

At the meeting of the JPC today, the attached papers on the appointment of a Deputy Commander in Chief, North East Command, in Newfoundland, were discussed. The Air Force representative, Group Captain Hodson, said that the U.S. Commander in Chief is willing to accept a Canadian Deputy who would have direct access to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff. It is apparently intended that this officer would command any Canadian Air Force and Air Defence units in Newfoundland. The U.S. Commander in Chief apparently feels that this arrangement would provide the best link between his Command and the Canadian Services, a matter which has given him trouble in the past.

I pointed out that the proposal obviously would not go far to meet the requirement set out in paragraph 4 of the letter of the Chief of the Air Staff that "the Air Defence of any Canadian territory must remain a Canadian responsibility". I suggested that, as the American installations have now made Newfoundland an area which must be provided with air defence, the R.C.A.F. might reconsider the proposed deployment of squadrons so that more squadrons would be sent to Newfoundland. That seemed the only effective way of ensuring that we really provide for the air defence of our territory.

Brigadier Gibson, Chairman JPC, pointed out that, although it was desirable for us to assume the air defence of all parts of the country, he did not think that it would be possible to find any more squadrons for despatch to Newfoundland.[74] Moreover, he felt that the installations in Newfoundland, although on Canadian soil, belong to the U.S. Air Force and, therefore, are of lower priority than Canadian industrial targets in cities. I suggested that perhaps the defence of targets within Canada might have a higher priority than commitments overseas but no member of the Committee took this up. Group Captain Hodson said that the Air Force could not see the possibility of finding any other squadrons for employment in Newfoundland and, therefore, had put forward this plan as the best possible arrangement. The general feeling of the Committee was that the proposal for a Deputy Commander was the best arrangement that had been made so far in these difficult circumstances. The JPS was, accordingly, charged with preparing draft terms of reference for this Deputy Commander.[75]

Memorandum from Chief of Air Staff to Secretary, Chiefs of Staff Committee

TOP SECRET Ottawa, August 8, 1951

APPOINTMENT OF A DEPUTY COMMANDER IN CHIEF,
NORTH EAST COMMAND, ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND

1. It is in the interests of the Canadian government that approval be sought for the appointment of a Senior Canadian officer to the position of Deputy C-in-C, North East Command, Newfoundland. Such an appointment would ensure that the activities of that Command in Canada are in accordance with Canadian governmental policies and responsibilities. It would also ensure a closer tie-in between US and Canadian forces for purposes of planning for the defence of that portion of Canada in which US leased bases are located.

2. In 1950, the US Joint Chiefs of Staff sought and obtained approval from the Canadian government for the establishment of North East Command in Newfoundland as a unified Command to provide for the control of US forces located in Newfoundland, Labrador and Greenland.[76] It was agreed that the missions assigned to North East Command were to be in consonance with the following two principles:

(a) Maintenance of the security of the US forces concerned.

(b) Planning in concert with the Canadian forces for the defence of such parts of North America and the sea and air approaches thereto as may be agreed upon from time to time by the Governments of US and Canada.

3. North East Air Command is the US Air Force component of North East Command. Inasmuch as the responsibilities of the latter Command are predominately air, a US North East Army Command has not been formed nor is it likely that one will be formed until mobilization occurs. Consequently the Commanding General

[76] Voir/See Volume 16, Document 846.

North East Air Command is at present also Commanding General North East Command. The appointment of C.G. NEAC is established for a General of 2-star rank.

4. While intended primarily to support SAC and MATS operations, North East Air Command will also have an air defence capability and may have US fighter forces assigned to its control. Notwithstanding the fact that these fighter forces will be primarily for defence of US bases and installations in North East Command, they will of course offer some protection for the Newfoundland area. The air defence of any Canadian territory must remain a Canadian responsibility and a suitable arrangement pertaining to the control of Air Defence forces of NEAC USAF and those of the RCAF is therefore required. This has been worked out and agreed to on the planning level between representatives of AFHQ and C-in-C North East Command. A copy of the proposed agreement is attached as an Appendix.

5. This agreement should provide satisfactory working arrangements for the control and employment of US Air Defence forces in the Newfoundland area as between North East Air Command, USAF and the RCAF's Air Defence Command. There will be many other problems facing both Canada and the US with respect to the command of forces in the Newfoundland area and it is important that these problems be solved now so that the peacetime organization for that area is such that in an emergency Canadian, as well as US interests, are protected. Accordingly there is a distinct need for the early appointment of a senior Canadian officer to be Deputy C-in-C, North East Command, Newfoundland, and since the majority of the problems will be related to air matters, I consider that the appointee should be an RCAF officer. Such an appointment, in addition to protecting Canadian interests at all times, will facilitate the planning required of US and Canadian forces for the defence of the Canadian area encompassed by North East Command.

6. RCAF maritime forces on the East Coast, assigned for the defence of the Canadian Atlantic Sub-Area, will come under the direct operational control of SACLANT when that headquarters is established. For that reason the command arrangements for the Newfoundland area will not include jurisdiction over the RCAF's maritime forces. Suitable arrangements have been worked out to permit these forces to operate under the control of SACLANT.

W.A. CURTIS
Air Marshal

[APPENDICE/APPENDIX]

SECRET August 1, 1951

AN AGREEMENT ON THE CONTROL ARRANGEMENTS PERTAINING TO THE AIR DEFENCE FORCES OF US NORTHEAST COMMAND AND THOSE OF THE RCAF

1. Although the air defence forces allocated to US Northeast Command are primarily for the protection of US bases and installations in Newfoundland, nevertheless the modern concept of Air Defence as an area proposition makes impracticable any distinction between defending installations and defending areas. Therefore, the same air defence forces that provide protection for the US installations in Newfoundland also provide protection for the Newfoundland areas. Again, a consideration of the radar coverage afforded by the proposed Canada-US extended radar program reveals that the Early Warning System provided for the US installations in Newfoundland, and hence for the area, merges with that of the St. Lawrence Valley. The strategic position of the Newfoundland chain across the probable route of enemy attacks is designed to offer early warning to the industrial areas of Eastern Canada and the US as well as for the US installations in Newfoundland. Therefore, the Air Defence Forces of US Northeast Command are an important and special part of the integrated defence of Canada and the US.

Sovereignty

2. The agreed Canada-US concept of air defence is to afford protection only for those areas which contain critical concentrations of our war-making capacity. The desire of the US to use bases in Newfoundland for such purposes as strategic air operations adds a further area of war-making capacity in Canada, and thus imposes the requirement for providing for the defence of this area. Canada, however, is not now capable of producing within her own resources the necessary forces, and hence this requirement can be met only if the US will accept the task. Arrangements, therefore, are necessary to permit US control of air defence forces employed in the area but should leave the over-all responsibility vested in the Canadian Air Defence Commander.

3. The urgent necessity for the protection of US installations in Newfoundland makes it essential that the US forces deployed for that purpose not be withdrawn for defence elsewhere without the prior approval of the Commander in Chief, US Northeast Command.

Air Defence Control Arrangements

4. The US air defence forces in the Newfoundland area will comprise an air defence division of the US Northeast Command.

5. This air defence division will be commanded by a US officer with an RCAF officer as deputy. Canadian air defence forces (includes AAA) in the Newfoundland area will be attached to the division for purposes of operational control.

6. The Air Defence Commander of Canada will exercise control over the US Northeast Command Air Defence Division to the extent that the deployment of air defence forces to Newfoundland and the operational practices and procedures of those forces will be subject to mutual agreement on a continued and flexible basis between the Canadian Air Defence Command and the Air Defence Division Commander of the US Northeast Command.

7. The redeployment of air defence forces within the Newfoundland air defence system will be made at the discretion of the Division Commander; the redeployment of Canadian forces, however, will be subject to mutual agreement between the Division Commander and the Air Defence Commander of Canada.

8. Aircraft control and warning information will pass directly, on a reciprocal basis, between the appropriate control centres of the Air Defence Division of the US Northeast Command and the Canadian Air Defence Command.

9. Canadian personnel will be provided for appropriate positions within the US Northeast Command air Defence Division to afford staff representation for Canadian forces in the Newfoundland air defence system and to initiate direction to the Canadian Civil Defence authorities.

10. These arrangements will be subject to review at the request of either country.

APPOINTMENT OF R.C.A.F. OFFICER AS DEPUTY C-IN-C, U.S. NORTHEAST COMMAND

The attached JPC paper of October 22nd on this matter is to be discussed by the Chiefs of Staff Committee.

I should think there is some danger — unless care is taken — that the proposed arrangements will lead to a situation in which NDHQ will make deals with the U.S. C-in-C (through the Canadian Deputy C-in-C) about which the government will not be consulted in advance. In this connection see paragraphs 1(c) and 4(a). It might therefore be desirable for it to be emphasized to the Canadian officer selected that his work in the Command is to be without prejudice to the present procedure (embodied in an approved PJBD recommendation) whereby any U.S. requirements for installations, etc., in Canada are put forward by the State Department on behalf of the U.S. government for consideration by the Canadian government. If the appointment is made, it might be worthwhile to have the Canadian officer present at the beginning of a Chiefs of Staff Committee meeting for briefing on this point by you and Mr. Heeney.

As I remember it, this U.S. C-in-C is, like other officers commanding U.S. Unified Commands, directly responsible to the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff. I suppose that, if the U.S. Joint Chiefs are prepared to show flexibility and tact in the matter, this fact need not mean that the Canadian Deputy would be treated as merely part of an organization working for, and reporting to, the U.S. Joint Chiefs. As, however, paragraph 4(e) of the attached paper speaks of him as, in part at least, a staff officer on the establishment of the Command performing functions assigned to him by the U.S. C-in-C, I should think that it would have to be fully agreed in advance with the Pentagon that the Canadian's "ambassadorial", advisory and liaison functions would not suffer as a result of his being technically in the position of a servant of the C-in-C and of the U.S. Joint Chiefs.

Rapport du Comité de la planification mixte au Comité des chefs d'état-major Report by Joint Planning Committee to Chiefs of Staff Committee

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], October 22, 1951

APPOINTMENT OF A SENIOR RCAF OFFICER TO US NORTH EAST COMMAND

Proposal

1. The Chief of the Air Staff has recommended the appointment of a senior Air Force Officer as a Deputy C-in-C, US Northeast Command in order that he may:

(a) Assist in ensuring that the activities in Canada of the US Northeast Command are in accordance with Canadian Government policy;

(b) Assist in co-ordinating the plans of the C-in-C, Northeast Command for the defence of the leased bases with Canadian plans for the defence of Canada;

(c) Assist in the solution of problems concerning the command of forces in Newfoundland and the protection of Canadian interests.

2. The Chief of the Air Staff recommends that the proposed Deputy C-in-C be a senior Air Force Officer because the majority of problems with which he will have to deal will be concerned with air matters.

3. To be effective this officer should be given the position of a Deputy C-in-C on the Northeast Command Establishment, although he would not, of course, assume command in the absence of the C-in-C. In addition he will need to have direct access to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee, which he should only use after due clearance, when appropriate, with the Canadian Field Commanders concerned.

4. Specific terms of reference are suggested as follows:

(a) To forecast requirements of Northeast Command to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee for advance information.

(b) To keep the C-in-C, Northeast Command, informed of Canadian Government and Service policies that affect Northeast Command.

(c) To be the principal staff officer of the C-in-C Northeast Command on all matters affecting that Command in which Canadian interests are involved.

(d) To represent the C-in-C Northeast Command in relations with the Canadian civil defence organization.

(e) As a staff officer on the establishment of Northeast Command to perform such other functions as are assigned to him by the C-in-C.

Recommendations

ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE DEFENCE OF NEWFOUNDLAND

At the Joint Planning Committee on December 4, we discussed document CSC 1171-1(JPC)† of December 1 which enclosed a letter of the same date from Brigadier Gibson. That letter reported on a recent conversation between General Whitten and the GOC Eastern Command.

2. The first point in the letter is that General Whitten's superiors have now approved, as a basis for planning, the document drafted in February 1951 by General Whitten and the Joint Services Committee (East Coast) entitled "Basic Provisions for Canada-U.S. Collaboration on Defence in the Northeastern Areas of Canada". General Whitten wished to know whether the GOC was authorized to use this document as a basis for planning. (The document is flagged on 50221A-40). The fact is that this document has been buried in the Chiefs of Staff since it was received last spring.

3. Brigadier Gibson's letter mentions other questions raised by General Whitten. These questions can hardly be answered without discussing the broad questions of (a) the contribution to be made by Canada to the defence of Newfoundland and (b) the command relationship between the U.S. and Canada in Newfoundland.

4. It will be recalled that an effort was made recently to make progress in the matter of command relationship. A paper was drafted recommending that the RCAF should have a high officer on the staff of the U.S. Northeast Command. This was discussed by the Chiefs of Staff on November 1 and was put over for further study by the RCAF.

5. The Joint Planning Committee was, of course, unable to reach any conclusions as to what should be done. It was decided, however, that the JPC should instruct the Joint Planning Staff to study the "basic provisions" paper of February 1951 and prepare a list of problems (with commentary) which need to be settled before that paper can be revised.

6. I am not sure what we can do about this whole subject in External Affairs. I do think, however, that the Canadian Government cannot continue to drift in relation to it. If Canada is not going to do anything about defending Newfoundland, it will become increasingly difficult to resist requests for permission to the U.S. to do more in peacetime to prepare for the defence of Newfoundland.

7. In this connection, it should be kept in mind, that in the event of war, the U.S. can probably do most of what it wants without permission, under Article 2 of the Leased Bases Agreement.

8. So far as I know, there has not been, at least in 1951, a thorough discussion of this whole subject in Chiefs of Staff. Should this Department perhaps take some initiative in promoting such a discussion?[77]

UNITED STATES AIR OPERATION OVER CANADIAN TERRITORY — INTERCEPTION OF UNIDENTIFIED AIRCRAFT

At its meeting on December 1, 1950, Cabinet Defence Committee considered a request from the U.S. Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence to allow U.S. Services to fly over Canadian territory as might be required in order to carry out effective interceptions of unidentified aircraft crossing the border from Canada into the United States. Cabinet Defence Committee agreed to recommend to Cabinet approval of the U.S. request subject to certain restrictive clauses already accepted by the U.S.A.F. and R.C.A.F. and subject to the extension of reciprocal concessions to Canada by the United States.

At its meeting in Kingston on May 8, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence passed a Recommendation (51/4) on Interceptor Flights. This Recommendation provides for reciprocal privileges and contains the conditions noted by Cabinet Defence Committee on December 1. Some other changes have been incorporated in the Recommendation.

(1) Operations are no longer restricted to the area between 87° West (i.e. Lake Superior) and the Atlantic Coast.

R.A.M[acKay] thinks not at the moment. He would however like Mr Phillips to prepare a memo[randum] on what happened in Newfoundland in last war. What forces did Canada put in, what command relationships, etc. M.W[ershof]

(2) The term "four engine aircraft" has been changed to "multi-engine aircraft" (meaning two or more engines) since it is believed that under certain conditions, twin engine aircraft might now reach the Canada-U.S. border from the U.S.S.R.

(3) The clause "investigating aircraft would not approach closer than 1,000 feet to any single engine or twin engine aircraft" has been changed to "investigating aircraft would not approach closer, in accordance with civil aeronautics authority and Department of Transport standards, than is necessary to establish identification".

It will be noted that the general principles and limitations of the agreement will be translated into operational instructions by a Canadian-U.S. team. The arrangements will remain in force until modified by agreement or terminated by either Government.

The Department of Transport has agreed to the Recommendation of the PJBD as it now stands. The Department of Transport expressed its anxiety that every precaution should be taken to avoid an attack on a Canadian plane which might inadvertently cross the U.S. border. In framing the operational instructions, the Canadian-U.S. team is to bear in mind the importance of this point.

It is recommended that Cabinet Defence Committee approve Recommendation 51/4 of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.[78]

CANADA-UNITED STATES AIR DEFENCE
MUTUAL RE-INFORCEMENT

1. The air defence systems of Canada and the United States are being developed and co-ordinated to provide for the mutual protection of those Canada-U.S. vital areas which are contiguous. To this end, joint Canada-U.S. action has been taken to extend the radar system and to establish common operational and communication procedures. Agreement has been reached on the principles that any force located in Canada will operate under a Commander designated by Canada, and that the forces of either country serving in the territory of the other will be under the immediate command of a Commander designated by the country furnishing the force. The Air Defence Commanders of Canada and the United States have been given the authority to carry out, on local notification, combined air defence training exercises.

2. The above joint actions provide the means for the employment of the air defence forces of either country, if need be, in the other country. However, under present arrangements, the basing of USAF air defence forces in Canada and RCAF air defence forces in the United States, except for combined air defence training exercises, must be negotiated through State Department-External Affairs channels.

3. After the outbreak of war against a common enemy, circumstances may occur which will require rapid reinforcement of the air defence forces of one country by the other. Such re-inforcement would be normally of short duration and would be initiated as a result of tactical considerations of the air battle. The rapidity with which squadrons can be re-deployed to meet the tactical situation may determine the degree of effectiveness of the air defence system. It is considered that in the event of war in which the United States and Canada are allied, the Canadian Air Defence Commander should be empowered to authorize the re-deployment of USAF Air Defence Forces to Canadian bases and the re-deployment of Canadian Air Defence Forces to United States bases when required to meet the tactical situation, when such re-deployment has been mutually agreed by the Air Defence Commanders of Canada and the United States. Similar delegation of authority to the Air Defence Commander will be required on the part of the United States.

4. It is recommended that the Cabinet Defence Committee:

(a) Approve the adoption of the principle of mutual re-inforcement of the Air Defence forces of Canada and the United States for planning purposes.

(b) Authorize the Canadian Section to place this matter before the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.[79]

CANADA-UNITED STATES AIR DEFENCE:
MUTUAL REINFORCEMENT

At the meeting of Cabinet Defence Committee on November 8th, 1951, the Minister of National Defence pointed out that the Air Defence systems of Canada and the United States were being developed and co-ordinated to provide for mutual protection of vital contiguous areas of the two countries and that, in the event of war, circumstances might require rapid reinforcement of the Air Defence forces of one country by the other.

2. The Committee agreed to the adoption for planning purposes of the principle of mutual reinforcement by the Air Defence forces of Canada and the United States. It was further agreed that, at the November meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, the Canadian members propose that the Board recommend to the two Governments that the Air Defence Commander of each country be empowered to authorize, in the event of war, the re-deployment of Air Defence forces of the other country to bases in his country, and of similar forces in his country to the other country, when necessary to meet the tactical situation and when agreeable to both Commanders.

3. At its meeting on November 12th, Cabinet approved the decision of Cabinet Defence Committee on this subject.

4. At its November meeting the PJBD agreed on a Recommendation which had been drafted by the Canadian Section in the light of the decision of Cabinet Defence Committee. This Recommendation is attached and it is recommended that it be approved by Cabinet Defence Committee.

Ottawa, February 19, 1951

Dear Mr. Heeney,

The Canadian Ambassador in Washington indicates in his despatch WA-490 of 7th February, 1951,† that the United States Civil Defence Administration has received requests from individual States and from groups of States for authority to open negotiations with various Canadian provinces with a view to forming compacts for mutual protection in the field of civil defence. I feel that the time is now opportune for the setting up of a joint United States-Canadian working group on civil defence to make joint recommendations to the respective governments. My Minister does not feel that a joint Civil Defence Board as at one time suggested would be appropriate.

As one of the major problems for discussion by such a group will, undoubtedly, be the working out of arrangements whereby civil defence personnel and supplies for mutual aid may cross the international boundary freely in the event of a disaster, it is suggested that the Canadian section include representatives of the Department of National Defence (Office of the Civil Defence Co-ordinator), Department of External Affairs, Department of National Revenue (Customs), Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the Justice Department (R.C.M.P.).

I would suggest a meeting of the joint United States-Canadian working group as soon as possible, preferably in Ottawa. Could you ascertain whether or not such an arrangement would be suitable to the United States?

Any conclusions reached by such a joint meeting could, subject to approval of the respective governments, be embodied in an agreement effected by an exchange of notes.

I feel that the time is also opportune to discuss the exchange, between United States and Canadian governments, of civil defence personnel on a working level. You will recall that this matter was discussed at the first United States-Canadian civil defence meeting held in Washington on 21st November, 1950.

Yours sincerely,

CANADA-U.S. COLLABORATION IN CIVIL DEFENCE

You will have noticed that, although I gave it to him, Mr. Claxton did not raise at Defence Committee today the attached letter of February 19th from Mr. Drury to Mr. Heeney suggesting that, as a follow-up to the conference in Washington in November, the State Department be informed that Canada was:

(a) agreeable to the establishment of a Canada-U.S. working group on civil defence to recommend to the governments solutions for "mutual support" problems (as discussed by the conference);

(b) prepared to discuss the exchange of civil defence personnel at the working level (the conference had recommended the exchange of one liaison officer).

Mr. Glazebrook told me at lunchtime today that, while External had been waiting since December 6th for National Defence to produce its views on the recommendations of the November Conference — so that a decision could be reached for communication to the State Department — he had just discovered that Mr. Claxton had issued an invitation to Washington to take part in a joint meeting here at 11:00 a.m. tomorrow.

The details are, apparently, that Mr. Claxton indicated direct to Washington a readiness to form a joint working group; suggested a meeting here tomorrow at which he will preside; and has sent a plane to Washington to pick up three U.S. civil defence officials, one State Department official and representatives of other U.S. departments.

Presumably he feels it important to have some further joint discussions in this way in advance of the Federal-Provincial meeting on Friday. At the same time, this direct approach to Washington, together with the prospect of an immediate decision that our Civil Defence agency be transferred to National Health and Welfare, makes it very difficult for External to judge what it should do about the State Department's request that the Canadian Government agree, in an exchange of notes, to the recommended joint working group and the exchange of a liaison officer as a preliminary to meetings of the working group and to an early conference of representatives of the Federal and local governments of both countries to hear the views of Provincial and State authorities on questions of cooperation.

Mr. Glazebrook has been trying to see Mr. Heeney to discuss this question. You may wish to raise it with Mr. Claxton or have it raised in Cabinet when the item "Civil Defence" comes up.[81]

CIVIL DEFENCE; RESPONSIBILITY AND FINANCING

36. The Minister of National Defence reported that a joint meeting of Canadian and U.S. officials on co-operation in civil defence was in progress in Ottawa. The main localities where need for co-operation might arise were Seattle and Vancouver, Sault Ste. Marie, Buffalo and Niagara Falls, and Detroit and Windsor.

An agreement had been drafted in advance, submitted to the meeting and approved with some changes. The principal one had been the addition of a paragraph establishing a joint Canadian-United States Civil Defence Committee, consisting of the federal civil defence authorities and such other members as they might designate and having the power to establish any necessary working groups and sub-committees. This committee would have the function of making recommendations to the two governments on action desirable to ensure close co-operation.

The draft agreement further provided that civil defence activities between the two countries be co-ordinated as far as possible for protection from the results of enemy attacks as if there were no border. Except as regards matters of broad government policy, the normal channel of communication between the two countries on civil defence would be the federal civil defence authorities. This would not preclude use of other channels as necessary, provided these authorities were kept informed. The respective civil defence authorities would keep one another informed of developments in a wide range of matters in their field and exchange personnel for liaison and training. So that all civil defence facilities and services might be used to the fullest extent in civil defence preparations, exercises and action, appropriate steps would be taken by federal and other authorities to ensure that there were adequate arrangements governing customs, immigration and the integration of services. State and provincial civil defence authorities in adjacent jurisdictions would be authorized to discuss mutual co-operation, and would be empowered to authorize co-operation between border municipalities in accordance with policies of the federal authorities. The cost of civil defence assistance furnished by one country in connection with an attack on the other would be reimbursed by the latter.

[81] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Noted N.A.R[obertson]

The draft agreement was circulated.

(Agreement: Canada-United States Arrangements for Co-operation on Civil Defence)†

37. Mr. Claxton said that U.S. officials concerned would have to submit the revised agreement to their government but were satisfied that it would be approved. He recommend approval so that the Department of External Affairs might arrange for signature.

In Canada, progress had been made on the federal civil defence organization and most of the provinces now had organizations, as had the principal cities that might be attacked. The federal government had issued a useful booklet, had held one training course and was holding a second.

It had never been intended that federal civil defence responsibilities should remain indefinitely with the Department of National Defence. On the suggestion of the Prime Minister, a committee of officials had looked into the question and had recommended to Cabinet Defence Committee a transfer to the Department of National Health and Welfare. That department had excellent relations with the provinces and municipalities and this was a most important aspect. On February 20th, Cabinet Defence Committee had agreed to recommend that federal civil defence responsibilities be transferred to the Department of National Health and Welfare and that such transfer be announced at the Dominion-Provincial Civil Defence Conference on February 23rd. The change might take place on the evening of February 23rd — at the end of the Conference.

If there were agreement on these proposals, his department would transfer its civil defence staff and the necessary funds to the Department of National Health and Welfare.

38. The Minister of National Health and Welfare wondered if civil defence responsibilities did not involve large tasks beyond the resources of his department. He pointed out that the government had not yet decided how much it should contribute to civil defence and considered that there should be a decision on this question prior to the proposed transfer.

39. Mr. Claxton suggested that it was generally agreed that the federal contributions should be as small as possible. The provinces would want guidance on this question at the Conference. He suggested that the federal government offer to assume responsibility for research and development (e.g. radiation detection and selection of a siren); operation of a central civil defence school, as at present; operation of schools for instructors on radiation; training aids and manuals, as at present; special equipment having no purpose other than that of civil defence (e.g. radiation detection instruments, respirators for civil defence workers and sirens for communities of over 20,000); and one-third of the cost of standardizing hose-couplings in communities of over 20,000; and stockpiling of medical supplies and blood.

40. The Minister of Finance thought this list satisfactory.

41. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the report of the Minister of National Defence on civil defence questions and:

(a) approved the draft agreement on co-operation with the United States in civil defence matters, as revised at the meeting of Canada and United States officials, and agreed that the Department of External Affairs be authorized to arrange for its signature;[82]

(b) approved the Minister's proposals as to the forms of contribution to civil defence that the federal government should make and his suggestion that these be made known to the provincial authorities on February 23rd; and

(c) approved the recommendation of Cabinet Defence Committee that federal civil defence responsibilities be transferred from the Department of National Defence to the Department of National Health and Welfare and that this transfer be announced at the outset of the Dominion-Provincial Civil Defence Conference on February 23rd; an Order in Council to be passed accordingly on that date.

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF U.S. GLOBAL COMMUNICATIONS FACILITIES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On July 27th, the U.S. Embassy presented a Note,† a copy of which is attached, in which Canadian approval was sought for the establishment by the U.S.A.F. of global communications facilities near Harmon Air Force Base and Pepperrell Air Force Base in Newfoundland. Because of its technical characteristics, the new equipment cannot be placed on the present U.S.-leased bases near the two areas in question; hence, small additional parcels of land are required.

At Harmon base the U.S.A.F. wishes to acquire approximately 210 acres of privately-owned land 12 miles west of the present base, as well as 209 acres of Crown land approximately 22 miles west. On each of these plots buildings would be erected. There is a further requirement for 180 acres of land 9 miles north of the Pepperrell base, as well as 3 acres of land for right of way. A building would be erected on this site.

The U.S. Government has asked that Canada make available the lands noted above to the United States "for its exclusive use for 20 years". The United States also asked that an extension of time should be considered at the end of 20 years. The land would be acquired by Canada and be made available without charge to the United States. The United States has asked that U.S. personnel stationed in the areas to be acquired should be given the same privileges and immunities as members of the U.S. forces stationed within the leased bases.

Neither the Department of National Defence nor the Department of Transport has any objection to the establishment of the facilities. The Department of National Defence has noted that "long-term leases such as the 20-year lease proposed should not be granted if other means could be found to make the land available and provide for the security of the buildings and property".

The United States has been informed, through the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, that the Canadian Government does not wish to grant any further long-term leases to the United States. U.S. officials have sometimes said that certainty of tenure for capital construction of facilities in Canada is necessary in order to obtain appropriations from Congress; the validity of this argument is now open to question. The United States has a defence agreement with Iceland which, in effect, gives to the United States tenure which may be terminated at any time by either side on eighteen months' notice. In France, U.S. tenure may be terminated on one year's notice, after which all immovable property reverts to the French Government. In the United Kingdom, no leases or assured rights of occupancy have been granted to U.S. forces, although capital charges for construction of facilities are shared. In view of the close relationships between Canada and the United States, there seems to be no reason why the United States should acquire in Canada fixed forms of tenure which it does not require of other North Atlantic Treaty countries.

On the question of privileges and immunities, it is suggested that this question should stand over for the present in view of the doubt which now exists on the exact status of the NATO Forces Agreement and relation of the Leased Bases Agreement to it.

It is, therefore, recommended that a reply should be sent to the U.S. Embassy along the following lines:

(1) The Canadian Government agrees in principle to the extension of U.S. global communications facilities within the areas in Newfoundland as defined in the U.S. Embassy Note.

(2) The land necessary for the facilities will be acquired by the Canadian Government, which will retain title to it.

(3) This land will be available without charge to the United States for its exclusive use for as long as, in the opinion of both Governments, there is a continuing need for the facilities.

(4) If, at any time in the future, it is decided by either Government that the facilities are no longer necessary for joint defence or for NATO purposes, the land, together with any immovable facilities on it, will, on twelve months' notice, revert to the use of the Canadian Government.

(5) Any movable property placed on the land by the United States may be removed by the United States at any time prior to the evacuation of the property by U.S. forces, or within a reasonable time thereafter.

(6) The Canadian Government does not wish at this time to make any commitments on the question of privileges and immunities until the position of the NATO Forces Agreement has been clarified. The Canadian Government nevertheless agrees that U.S. forces stationed on the land in question will be granted privileges and immunities on a standard no lower than those set forth in the NATO Forces Agreement, conditional on the approval of that Agreement by the Parliament of Canada.[83]

PERSONAL. CONFIDENTIAL. Washington, December 10, 1951

Dear Bob [Phillips],

I was talking to Bill Wight this morning on another subject and during the discussion he referred to the U.S. request for global communication facilities. He said that aside from other issues, the State Department (and I gather particularly Bill Wight) was embarrassed by having to submit to the Department of Defense the Canadian counter-proposal. He said that it had been his understanding that the U.S. note of July 27, requesting the exclusive use of the land for 20 years, had been submitted in draft form to External and that at that time our Department had expressed confidence that its terms would be acceptable to the Government. It was on this basis, apparently, that the Department of Defense had agreed to the modification of their note of February, 1951.

I said that I was not aware that the American Embassy's note of July 27 had received the informal approval of External in draft form, but if it had it was apparent that the Government had not accepted in full the recommendations of Canadian officials.

I would be grateful if you would let me know whether in fact the U.S. note of July 27 had been submitted in the first instance in draft form and had received informal approval.

Incidentally, we expect that the State Department will wish to discuss with us the conditions set out in our note No. 322 of November 9. I think they will be particularly interested as to whether these conditions would be considered by the Canadian Government as setting a precedent with respect to future U.S. requests. I appreciate that there is little background information with which I am not already familiar. However, should you care to offer any comments they would be most welcome.

You might wish to show this letter to Bert MacKay.

My best regards to both of you.

SECRET AND PERSONAL Ottawa, December 18, 1951

Dear Peter [Towe]:

Bob Phillips has shown me your letter of December 10 regarding the U.S. request for global communications facilities in Newfoundland.

Your letter disturbs me. Since I was the one particularly involved here I think I had better give you a blow by blow account of what happened.

In the first place, Don Bliss presented a Note dated February 21st, 1951† requesting the sites for ninety-nine years and the extension of rights under the Leased Bases Agreement to the sites under Article 27 of that Agreement. (My recollection is that this came in by mail although I am not sure on this point.)

After consulting Mr. Heeney I asked Bliss to come in. I told him that the request for ninety-nine year leases was simply out of the question and unless they wished an outright rejection, the Note should be redrafted on this point. I said I thought the best they could hope for was something along the lines of the Goose Bay arrangement although this was purely my personal opinion. Bliss and I worked out a redraft of the paragraph referring to tenure carefully avoiding the word "lease". Subsequently a new draft Note was presented on July 27th, substantially as redrafted by Bliss and myself.

In the meantime a U.S. enquiry had come forward about Torbay. The Canadian Section of the PJBD were accordingly instructed on or about May 1st to tell the U.S. Section at the forthcoming meeting of the Board that while we were sympathetic about their needs at Torbay, it was firm Government policy that there would be no more leases. This instruction was approved by the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Minister of National Defence.

At the Kingston meeting of the Board the U.S. were explicitly told that there would be no more leases. The item of the Board Minutes reads as follows:

> "The Canadian Chairman referred to recent requests from the U.S. Government (Note No. 322 of April 23† and Note No. 324 of April 30† from the U.S. Embassy in Ottawa) which indicated the desire of the U.S. authorities to acquire extensive new facilities in Newfoundland. He pointed out that Canada is not merely willing but most anxious to cooperate with the U.S. in projects required in Canada for the joint defence of North Atlantic Treaty Organization. He said that the Canadian Government would view most sympathetically any request which the U.S. might submit to further these two ends. The Canadian Government did not, however, believe that it was necessary for the U.S. to acquire any further leases in Canada for defence purposes. There would be no difficulty from the point of view of Canadian sovereignty, in permitting the U.S. to use and develop a Canadian installation if that use and development were found to be necessary to our joint defence or for NATO."

There is no reference in the Minutes to any comment or objection from the U.S. members nor can I recall anything said by them off the record at the time.

If the discussion with me about the original Note on global communications were correctly reported, I cannot see that the U.S. officials have any basis whatever for suggesting that they were misled. I was simply trying to help them out. I gave no assurance that the new draft would be acceptable to Ministers, and as far as I can recollect I gave none that it would be acceptable even at the official level. I simply gave as my personal opinion that the request for tenure extending over the remainder of the ninety-nine year period under the Leased Bases agreement, together with all the privileges and immunities of the Bases agreement would "queer the pitch" entirely, and that the request would be likely to receive more sympathetic consideration if re-drafted as suggested.

I should like to point out also that the meeting of the PJBD was held on May 10th — the redraft of the Note was not presented before July 27th. In short, both the State Department and the Defense Department had plenty of warning that a request for twenty-years' possession, even if the word lease was not used, was probably out of line with the views of the Government at the time.

It seems to me rather far fetched to suggest that had they known they wouldn't get assured occupation for twenty years, they would have pressed for the ninety-nine year term. In my judgment had they done so they might very well not only have prejudiced consideration of the present request, but others to come later.

I am not suggesting that you go storming down to the State Department. However, some time if you have a chance to put these views before Bill Wight or Norris Haselton privately and strongly, I should appreciate it.

Yours sincerely,

R.A. MacKay

LORAN STATIONS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

The United States Coast Guard now operates three Loran stations in Newfoundland at Bona Vista, Battle Harbour and Port aux Basques. They are linked with other Loran stations in Nova Scotia operated by the Department of Transport and with Loran stations in the United States.

2. In April, 1945, the United States, through the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, first suggested the transfer of the Newfoundland stations to the appropriate Canadian authorities. In view of the fact that the United Kingdom was then actively considering an alternative to Loran, and since Newfoundland was not then part of Canada, the Canadian Government decided not to take over the stations at that time. The United States continued to express a desire to give up its responsibilities, and in September, 1950, raised the question again through diplomatic channels. In the absence of a Canadian reply, the U.S. authorities placed the subject on the agenda of the PJBD in January, 1951, and sent a further note in February, 1951. No direct reply has been given by the Canadian Government, although the Canadian Section of the PJBD said that it would see whether the Department of Transport would be in a position to assume responsibility for the operation of the stations by the end of 1951.

3. The United States had offered to turn over the stations to Canada free of charge, but Canada would be obliged to pay the maintenance costs, which are estimated at $165,000.00 a year. Should the Canadian Government decide at any time to discontinue operation of the stations, the United States has requested the right to resume operations. No accurate record of the value of the buildings and capital equipment is available, but a rough estimate of $1,000,000 has been made. The stations are believed to be in good condition, but housing is of the barrack type. The Department of Transport estimates that approximately $100,000 would be needed to provide further accommodation and alterations. The chief use of the stations is as an aid to civil air and marine navigation; they are of military importance mainly in wartime. The Royal Canadian Navy anticipates that Loran will continue to be used for an indefinite period, but the RCAF is of the opinion that within a few years Loran will be superseded for military air navigation.

4. The possible transfer of the Loran stations has been discussed by officials of the Departments of Transport, National Defence and External Affairs, and differing opinions have emerged. The Department of Transport has pointed out that these stations are not military installations and therefore do not fall within the general Canadian policy regarding the assumption of responsibility for defence installations on Canadian soil. In the event of a decision to take over the stations from the U.S. Coast Guard, the Department of Transport anticipates difficulties in securing personnel. For this reason it would not be possible to take over the stations by the end of 1951, and probably a full year would be required from the time the decision was taken.

5. The Department of Transport has also suggested that owing to Canada's geographic position, the air navigation facilities which Canada operates as aids to trans-Atlantic flying are disproportionately extensive in relation to the number of Canadian aircraft making use of them. In addition, Canada contributes through the International Civil Aviation Organization about $114,000 a year for the support of Loran stations in Iceland and the Faroes as well as for other facilities. Cabinet accepted this assessment in April, 1949, on a temporary basis on condition that a survey should be made by ICAO of the total contribution of each country, including the facilities operated by each. The present financial support is arranged through a separate multilateral agreement in respect of each particular facility. The Department of Transport has pointed out that the prospects of securing reimbursement through ICAO for the three Newfoundland Loran stations would be much better if they were not taken over until the proposed survey had been carried out. The present agreements contain no provision for payments to Canada even if the survey should indicate a credit balance in favour of Canada.

6. The Department of National Defence and the Department of External Affairs, on the other hand, believe that, although Loran stations are not military in a strict sense, the continued presence of U.S. installations of this nature on Canadian soil does not accord with Government policy. In practice the Canadian authorities have little control over the activities of the U.S. employees operating the stations in these relatively unsettled areas. Canadian refusal to accept responsibility for the three installations which the United States wishes to turn over might prejudice the Canadian position in future cases when Canada might be pressing the United States to relinquish an installation on Canadian soil.

7. Although Canadian contributions to navigational aids under ICAO may be excessive, in the view of the Departments of National Defence and External Affairs it is necessary to give an answer to the U.S. Government without awaiting the completion of the survey of navigational aids in the Atlantic.

8. It is therefore requested that Cabinet decide whether or not the Canadian Government accedes to the U.S. request concerning transfer of the Loran stations in Newfoundland.

TRANSFER OF LORAN STATIONS TO CANADIAN GOVERNMENT[84]

This subject was considered by Cabinet on April 26. Although we have not yet received the minutes, we understand that Cabinet did not agree to the request of the U.S. authorities that we should take over the stations as soon as administrative factors allow. We understand that it was the view of Cabinet that we should ask I.C.A.O. whether the stations were in fact necessary. If they were not necessary, they might be closed; if they were necessary, I.C.A.O. might support them.

For a number of reasons, this decision may involve the Canadian Government in some embarrassment. Whatever the view of I.C.A.O. on the usefulness of the stations, undoubtedly the U.S. considers them necessary. This is proved by their recent decision to install extensive new equipment at Bona Vista. There is, therefore, little chance that the stations will be closed and that the problem will be solved in this way.

On the other hand, it also seems improbable that I.C.A.O. will, at least for some time to come, provide any financial support, although they might eventually do so. Meanwhile, the stations will be a source of embarrassment in our relations with the United States. It is probably true that whether the stations were being run by the U.S. Coast Guard or the Department of Transport would not affect I.C.A.O.'s decision on support. Therefore, it can be argued that the question of support should not delay our assumption of responsibility for the stations.

Apart from these arguments within the more limited field of meteorological requirements, the strongest case for acceding to the U.S. request for the transfer of the stations rests on our overall policy governing the status of U.S. installations in Canada. We are now attempting to limit U.S. rights in Canada and even to limit exclusively U.S. activity in Canada. Our refusal to take over three Loran stations which the United States is anxious to give up seems inconsistent with the policy which we are trying to espouse in respect of larger installations, and may even prejudice our arguments.

I understand that, through lack of time, Cabinet members were unable to consider carefully the brief on the Loran stations before the question was discussed. Do you think that it would be wise to raise the question again on the basis of the considerations set forth above?

TRANSFER OF LORAN STATIONS TO CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Yesterday you explained to me that Cabinet would consider the transfer of the three Newfoundland Loran Stations to Canada if it could be shown that the stations were of value

(a) to the Canadian Services, to Canadian civil aviation or marine shipping, or,

(b) to Canada in collaboration with the United States for joint defence, or,

(c) to Canada as a member of NATO.

You suggested that the Department of National Defence, in collaboration with the Department of Transport, should, as quickly as possible, prepare a paper estimating the value of these stations. There might then be a possibility of having the matter reconsidered by Cabinet before the meetings of the PJBD next week.

At the final meeting of the Canadian Section Wednesday afternoon, I explained the position as you outlined it. The Air and Naval Members of the Board said that the operation of the stations by Canada could not be justified by Canadian Service interests and they were reluctant to state that the stations were required for joint North American defence or NATO defence. The Service members did not think that it would be possible to prepare a satisfactory brief for Cabinet consideration within the next two days. In the circumstances, therefore, the following course of action was decided upon, subject to your approval:

The Service members will, in collaboration with the Department of Transport, prepare a brief on the value of the three Loran Stations. They will take this brief to the Kingston meetings where the Canadian Naval Member will explain that the transfer of the Loran Stations is under consideration by the Canadian Government, but no decision has been reached. The Canadian Naval Member will refer to the brief on the value of the stations and say that it would be helpful if the U.S. Section would comment on it and add to it if the U.S. authorities see fit. The Canadian Section will then undertake to draw all the relevant new information to the attention of the Canadian authorities in the hope that a final decision may then be reached.

It was evident at the meetings of the Canadian Section yesterday that the Service members were anxious for the Canadian Government to assume responsibility for these stations not for any intrinsic value, which, in any event, they thought might be difficult to justify, but as part of our overall policy on U.S. installations in Canada.

Do you agree with the line which the Board proposes to take at Kingston?[85]

Memorandum from Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 193-51 [Ottawa], July 10, 1951

LORAN STATIONS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

At its meeting on April 26, the Cabinet:

(a) noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the United States had asked Canada to assume the responsibility for maintaining three standard Loran stations in Newfoundland; and,

(b) agreed that it be indicated to the United States that, as the stations would be of little service to Canada, the question of their importance to international civil aviation should be referred to the International Civil Aviation Organization for an opinion, on the understanding that, if I.C.A.O. considered them of value to trans-Atlantic traffic, an arrangement would be sought, under which Canadians would operate the stations but other appropriate I.C.A.O. countries would contribute the major portion of the cost of their operation and maintenance.

2. The transfer of the U.S. Loran stations at Bona Vista, Battle Harbour and Port aux Basques in Newfoundland to the Canadian Government may be considered either on the basis of the usefulness of the stations as aids to navigation, or as part of the larger problem of U.S. installations on Canadian soil. This memorandum will consider these aspects in turn.

Value of the Stations as Aids to Navigation

3. The value of the Loran stations as aids to navigation has recently been reconsidered by the Departments of National Defence and Transport in the light of both wartime and peacetime requirements. In wartime, a long-range navigational system is required over the whole of the Atlantic Ocean north of the Tropic of Cancer. In particular, cover is required over the northern and southern convoy routes between the United States and Canada on the west, and the United Kingdom on the east. The three Newfoundland Loran stations are members of a chain which provide this coverage for the northern convey route.

4. The stations in peacetime provide accurate fixing facilities for merchant vessels, trans-Atlantic commercial aircraft, military aircraft, R.C.N. ships, large fishing vessels, and weather patrol vessels. The commercial airlines are probably the most frequent users. In wartime, in addition to these services, they would provide an essential navigational aid for merchant vessel convoys in the fog area.

5. The only other long-range navigational aid in operation is Consol. It is the view of the Can.-U.K.-U.S. Joint Communications Electronics Committee that the existing Loran cover on the western side of the Atlantic is satisfactory. The Canadian authorities concerned consider it unlikely that the Western Atlantic Loran stations will be superseded by Consol or by any other system in the foreseeable future. Even if an alternative system were found to be more efficient, it would probably take at least three or four years to replace the existing facilities.

6. The Department of National Defence and the Department of Transport, therefore, conclude that the operation of the three Newfoundland Loran stations should be continued. The Department of National Defence further recommends that Canada should accept the transfer of these stations from the U.S. Coast Guard as soon as administrative factors permit.

The Stations in Relation to Canadian Policy Respecting U.S. Installations in Canada

7. It has long been the policy of the Canadian Government to limit the extent of exclusively U.S. activity on Canadian soil where it is practicable to do so. The number and scope of defence installations, whether Canadian, joint, or U.S. operated, in Canada will, no doubt, increase in the near future in accordance with military requirements. Active consideration is now being given to the status of U.S. activity in Canada. In consideration of this problem, one guiding principle has been that as far as Canadian resources allow, and in consonance with military necessity, exclusively U.S. activity in Canada should be limited.

8. The three Loran stations in Newfoundland may or may not be considered as military installations since they have both civil and military use. In relation to defence policy, the essential fact is that they constitute three exclusively U.S. installations on Canadian soil. Further, they are installations which, for at least the past six years, the U.S. has been anxious to turn over to Canada. If we continue to resist acceptance of the responsibility for these stations, we may weaken our case when we may wish to exert Canadian control or at least joint control elsewhere over defence projects on Canadian soil.

9. The cost to Canada for the operation of these stations has been estimated at $165 thousand a year. No guarantee can be offered that I.C.A.O. will accept all or part of this cost as a contribution to navigational aids in the Atlantic. Nevertheless, an application can be made to I.C.A.O. that the cost of the stations be considered a contribution to be taken into consideration in respect of the Canadian share of North Atlantic navigation facilities. Until and unless I.C.A.O. replies favourably to such a submission, the cost of the stations would have to be justified as part of the cost of carrying out the long-range policy of the Canadian Government in respect to foreign installations on Canadian soil. Part of the cost, though probably a small part, can be justified on the usefulness of the stations to Canadian civil and military aircraft and shipping. At present, the users of the stations would be predominantly non-Canadian since there are fewer Canadian operators of aircraft or surface vessels travelling the routes than operators by other countries.

10. Apart from cost, one of the main difficulties of assuming responsibility for the stations is the recruitment of manpower to run them. The U.S. Navy has placed at the disposal of the Canadian authorities facilities for training Canadian operators. The Department of Transport has estimated that, owing to manpower shortages, the actual changeover could not take place for at least a year from the time that a decision is taken to assume responsibility for the stations. In its requests to turn over the stations to the Canadian Government, the U.S. offered to transfer all buildings and equipment without charge, with the proviso that if Canada ever discontinued operation, the United States might resume responsibility.

11. In view of the considerations outlined above, it is recommended, with the concurrence of the Departments of National Defence and of Transport, that the United States be informed that Canada will assume responsibility for the stations as soon as administrative factors permit. It is further recommended that we inform the United States that Canada, once having assumed operation of the stations, will not discontinue operation of the stations without prior consultation with the United States.[86]

OPERATION BY CANADA OF THREE LORAN STATIONS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

This question has not advanced substantially since last April when it was considered by Cabinet. At that time, you will recall, Cabinet decided that I.C.A.O. should be asked for an opinion of the usefulness of the stations, on the understanding that if they were declared useful, we would seek joint support.

The Department of Transport has not addressed to I.C.A.O. any communication on this subject. With the help of the U.S. Members of the Permanent Joint Board on Defense, the Department of National Defence prepared a strong case on the usefulness of the stations. Officials in the Department of National Defence concurred in our view that, for political reasons, Canada should assume control of the stations as part of our overall defence policy. The matter was raised in Cabinet again on August 2, when it was decided that no decision should be taken until the matter had been submitted to I.C.A.O. (Although nothing can now be done about it, it was unfortunate that both times the subject came before Cabinet, its presentation suffered from administrative accident. In April, the memorandum on the subject was not distributed to the members until the actual meeting. In August, the subject was put on an agenda which was already over-crowded immediately after the Minister's return to Ottawa).

[86] Décision reportée par le Cabinet, le 2 août 1951.
Decision deferred by Cabinet, August 2, 1951.

We understand that the Department of Transport is no longer as confident as it once was that Canadian contributions to navigational aids are disproportionately high. It may well be that Transport would now prefer not to raise this question with I.C.A.O. Transport might now agree to the principle of Canadian operation of the stations if the actual take-over date were postponed until manpower was available. Nevertheless, having done everything possible for the past six months (not to mention the preceding five years) to get Transport to agree to a decision which we consider to be in the interests of Canadian defence policy, I doubt that we can take any further initiative in pressing this course which appears to be out of line with the Cabinet decision of April 26, as confirmed on August 2.

We have, therefore, drafted for your signature a letter to Transport† asking that Department to prepare the necessary communication to I.C.A.O. This letter is necessary because Transport has apparently misinterpreted the August 2 Cabinet decision to mean that Cabinet deferred a decision indefinitely; from Cabinet minutes it is quite clear that Cabinet intended to defer decision only until the matter had been taken up with I.C.A.O. Without this letter to Transport, therefore, the whole matter would probably be shelved.

If you agree that we should take no further action beyond pressing the submission to I.C.A.O., the Canadian Section at the November meeting of the PJBD will inform the U.S. Section that the question of the Loran Stations has been referred to I.C.A.O. and that no decision will be available until I.C.A.O.'s views have been received.[87]

SECURITY INVESTIGATION OF MERCHANT SEAMEN

A meeting to discuss ways and means of resolving the problems involved in establishing a procedure for the security investigation of merchant seamen serving in Canadian ships on the Great Lakes (and possibly deep sea vessels as well) was held in the Privy Council Committee Room, East Block, on Tuesday, January 9th, 1951, at 10:30 a.m.

Present

Mr. Paul Pelletier, Privy Council Office (Chairman)
Mr. R.G. Robertson, Privy Council Office
Mr. M.M. MacLean, Department of Labour
Captain J.W. Kerr, Department of Transport
Captain F.S. Slocombe, Department of Transport
Captain E.S. Brand, Canadian Maritime Commission
Mr. G. de T. Glazebrook, Department of External Affairs
Mr. D.W. Mundell, Department of Justice
Lieut. Commander J.H.G. Bovey, Department of National Defence
Lieut. Commander A.C.A. Baker, Department of National Defence
Superintendent G.B. McClellan, Royal Canadian Mounted Police
Inspector R.A.S. MacNeil, Royal Canadian Mounted Police
Mr. E.F. Gaskell, Privy Council Office (Secretary).

1. The Chairman reviewed the discussion which had taken place at the meeting held on December 15th with Captain H.T. Jewell of the United States Coast Guard who had come to Ottawa to explain the procedures employed in carrying out the President's Executive Order (No. 10173) relating to the safeguarding of vessels, harbours, ports and waterfront facilities of the United States.[88]

He explained that the Chairman, Security Panel,[89] prior to his departure for the United Kingdom, had expressed a desire to have this matter progressed without further delay, emphasizing the need to have Canadian plans formulated and ready to be put into operation before the opening of navigation on the Great Lakes next spring.

2. Captain Kerr outlined the procedures which had been in effect in Canada during the late war, and stated that the Canadian Seaman's Identity Certificate, issued by the Department of Transport was now used chiefly to facilitate the landing of [88] Voir/See United States, Federal Register No. 15, October 18, 1950, pp. 7005ff.

[89] Norman Robertson.

Canadian seamen at United States ports. He stated that an efficient organization was maintained by Transport for the purpose of issuing these certificates, and that the register of merchant seamen maintained by the Department would prove invaluable if it became necessary to carry out security investigations on a large scale. He indicated that about 6,700 seamen were normally employed on the Great Lakes each season, and stated that a large percentage of these men had already applied for identity certificates.

3. Mr. Robertson observed that it would be necessary to reach a decision in principle as to whether we should impose mandatory regulations or attempt to resolve the problem by some form of labour-management agreement before going into detailed discussion of the mechanics and this approach was generally concurred in.

4. Captain Brand stated that it was urgently necessary to take all possible steps to ensure the security of our own ships and port facilities by arbitrary measures, if necessary, and he urged that planning to this end should proceed without delay.

5. Mr. MacLean expressed the view that no serious difficulty was likely to be experienced in dealing with the various trade unions involved. The principal contact would be with the Seafarers' International Union, and this organization was likely to prove co-operative in carrying out schemes such as that envisaged in the preliminary talks. He further stated that if there was a possibility that we might have to evolve a system in accordance with the present U.S. policy, we should plan to do so at the earliest possible date. He felt, also, that security investigations might be facilitated by requiring all ships' crews to be recruited through the machinery of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

6. Superintendent McClellan stated that if the R.C.M. Police were able to proceed with the necessary file checks at an early date, the great majority of cases could be processed before the opening of navigation next spring. It would be necessary, however, to begin the work before February 15th. He also gave it as his opinion that mandatory regulations would be required to provide an efficient organization and a workable solution to the problem. He further stated that the R.C.M. Police would be prepared to provide a draft questionnaire form suitable for use in checking merchant seamen, and also a sample identity card which would meet the special requirements of the intended operation.

7. Captain Kerr stated that the relevant Unemployment Insurance number was used by the Department of Transport, in conjunction with the Canadian Seaman's Identity Certificate, to prevent forgeries and to facilitate checking on the bona fides of the holders.

8. Mr. Glazebrook expressed the view that it would be most desirable to give the United States Government some early indication of our intended plan. This could be done in such a manner as to satisfy any questions likely to come from Washington without committing us to details before the problem had been resolved by the Canadian authorities.

9. It was agreed after discussion:

(1) That security investigation of Canadian merchant seamen (by file check) should be carried out on a compulsory basis, and that suitable regulations should be drafted to cover the intended operation;

(2) that planning should proceed at once to enable the R.C.M. Police to make an early start on file checks;

(3) that a small sub-committee, to include representatives of Transport, Labour, Justice, the Canadian Maritime Commission and the R.C.M. Police, should be set up to discuss procedures and draft appropriate regulations; and

(4) that the U.S. Government should be advised, through diplomatic channels, of our intended plans at the earliest possible date.

10. It was further agreed that the sub-committee should meet on Friday, January 12th, at 10:30 a.m. to consider draft regulations and to discuss the mechanics of carrying out the necessary security investigations.

GREAT LAKES SEAMEN'S SECURITY REGULATIONS

Attached are draft security regulations respecting merchant seamen on the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence.† The draft was prepared by a Working Committee of the Security Panel consisting of representatives of the Department of Transport, the Department of Labour, the Canadian Maritime Commission, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Department of National Defence, the Department of Justice and this office.

These are the first regulations of this character to be submitted to the Government for consideration and approval. Although it is anticipated that these regulations, if approved, will be extended to cover deep-sea shipping it was thought advisable, for the time being, to restrict their application to the Great Lakes for the following reasons.

(a) if the principle involved is approved the security measures can be announced and the necessary administrative machinery put in motion before the opening of navigation on the Great Lakes this coming Spring;

(b) some experience can be gained in the actual application of the regulations in a restricted field prior to their being extended to shipping generally;

(c) there are several vital works along the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence shipping routes which should be made as secure as possible in the immediate future;

(d) United States authorities have intimated that Canadian vessels may be denied use of the U.S. locks at Sault-Ste. Marie unless personnel manning the ships have been adequately screened from a security point of view. (You may be aware that an elaborate system of merchant seamen security clearance has been established in the United States under the U.S. Coast Guard which applies to all U.S. shipping, both inland and deep-sea, with the exception of the coastal trade.)

In drafting the attached regulations every effort has been made to keep them as simple, direct and flexible as possible without in any way impairing their effectiveness. The gist of the regulations is to provide that after a specified date no seaman shall be employed aboard any Canadian ship on the Great Lakes, including the St. Lawrence as far east as Montreal, unless he is the holder of the prescribed Seaman's Card. These cards will be issued by the Minister of Labour through the National Employment Service upon the submission to the Minister, in each individual case, of a favourable security report by the RCM Police. Penalties up to a fine of $500 or three months imprisonment are provided for offences.

I would like to draw your attention particularly to sections 12 to 15 of the regulations concerning the appeals procedure. These sections have caused the Working Committee a good deal of concern. It should be borne in mind that a good many sources of information available to the RCM Police cannot be divulged without seriously compromising the usefulness of such sources. In the circumstances, it may be found that in actual practice an Advisory Committee, appointed under section 13 of the regulations, may find itself hard put to judge the real merits of a case in the event the Police cannot place complete information at the disposal of the Committee. It seems to me, however, as indeed it did to the Committee, that if restrictive regulations of this character are to be put into force in peacetime, some form of appeal must also be provided for and that the procedures set out in sections 12 to 15 probably represent the least that can be done in the circumstances. You will note that under the proposed appeals procedure Advisory Committees are only empowered to make recommendations to the Minister with whom rests the final decision.

I have been given to understand that the promulgation of the attached security regulations would in no way antagonize labour unions and that, on the contrary, many groups would be anxious to cooperate actively in enforcing the regulations. This is particularly true since the Canadian Seamen's Union is no longer a factor to be taken into consideration. The same degree of cooperation can also be expected from ship owners.

Generally speaking, I think the attached regulations are necessary, workable and worthy of consideration. They may well become the prototype of similar regulations to be extended gradually to defence industries and other vital undertakings. It is for this reason, amongst others, that it is recommended that the attached regulations be made the responsibility of the Minister of Labour rather than that of the Minister of Transport.

It should be noted, of course, that even if approved in principle these regulations can only be brought into force if and when special emergency legislation is ratified. An early decision would nonetheless be desirable in order that all necessary administrative arrangements, such as the printing of application forms, etc., may be made prior to the actual coming into force of the regulations.[90]

1. I saw Freeman Matthews, Deputy Under-Secretary of the Department of State this afternoon to protest the publicity given to the charges in the Senate Internal Security Sub-Committee of the Committee on the Judiciary and the manner in which this question had been handled in that committee.

2. I called to Mr. Matthews' attention the editorials referred to in your paragraph two as an indication of the public reaction in Canada and left copies of those editorials with him.[91]

3. I advised him that it was the hope of the Canadian Government that it would not be necessary to give publicity to our protest but pointed out to him that it was quite possible that the Canadian Government might find it necessary to give such publicity.

4. I left with Mr. Matthews a memorandum, the text of which is quoted below, which was based on paragraphs 1 and 3 of your message. Since the recent publicity has resulted from the hearings in the Senate sub-committee and none has resulted from hearings of a Committee on Un-American Activities reference to that committee was deleted.

5. The text of my memorandum was as follows: Text begins:

"The Canadian Government was surprised to learn that the Senate Internal Security Sub-Committee of the Committee on the Judiciary found it necessary to make public reference to a high official of the Canadian Government, E.H. Norman, and on the basis of unimpressive and unsubstantiated statements by a former Communist, in a way which could not fail to prejudice the position of that official before the public of his own and other countries.

[91] Voir/See "The Contemptible Attack on Mr. Norman" in Ottawa Citizen, August 11, 1951; "The Smear Comes North" in Globe and Mail, August 11, 1951.

The State Department will know that the Canadian Government has complete confidence in Mr. Norman, and hopes that they will inform the Congressional Committees of this fact, and its consequent regret and annoyance that their counsel went out of his way to drag Mr. Norman's name into their hearings.

The Canadian Government does not desire any publicity to be given to its representations, because there has been too much publicity already on this subject but it is to be hoped that the committees can instruct their counsel to act differently in the future in matters which concern officials of this government. If in evidence before investigating committees in Washington names of Canadian officials appear, the Canadian Government naturally expects that these names can be sent in confidence to the Canadian Government so that the allegations made can be investigated here and the results referred back to the State Department.

The Canadian Government hopes that the State Department will agree that this is the course which should have been followed in this case, and will be able to give some assurance that it will be followed in the future". Text ends.

6. After reading the memorandum Mr. Matthews said that he did not disagree with anything stated in it and expressed his sincere regrets at the publicity which had arisen. He undertook to bring our memorandum to the attention of the appropriate authorities and to do what he could to prevent a repetition. He said that he felt he had to point out however that the State Department had not yet been able to devise a means of preventing similar publicity of unfounded charges against members of its own staff and that therefore while he would do whatever may be possible to prevent a recurrence in the case of Canadian officials he was not in a position to give any assurances of success in his efforts.

RE MCCARRAN COMMITTEE CHARGES

This afternoon I saw Mr. Bliss, the U.S. Chargé d'Affaires, to inform him of the very serious view taken by the Canadian government of the continuing references to Canadian officials in the proceedings of the Senate sub-Committee on Internal Security and of our inability to obtain, through the only channel open to us viz the State Department, the name or names and the alleged charges. As Mr. Bliss was aware, we had been surprised and annoyed at the proceedings of the Committee when Norman's reputation was impugned. We were now being put in an impossible position and we hoped that the State Department were doing everything possible to obtain for us the information we had requested.

Mr. Bliss told me that the State Department were bending every effort to obtain the information we had requested. They also took a serious view of the Committee's proceedings, but were powerless. He said that the State Department had given high priority to this matter and hoped to be able to report something to us later this afternoon.

Finally, I pointed out that a leak in Washington had forced the Minister to make a statement in respect of Norman.[92] We would have to make a further statement to the press unless the matter could be cleared up very promptly. Newspaper comment right across Canada indicated the indignation felt by Canadians at the treatment accorded trusted servants of the Canadian government. Canadians could not understand why the U.S. government could do nothing to put a stop to these activities.

SECRET [Ottawa], August 17, 1951

Yesterday evening about six o'clock I spoke over the telephone to Mr. Matthews in Washington on instructions from the Minister. I said that Mr. Pearson wanted him to let the State Department know that there had been a constant stream of enquiries from newspapermen here about the story which appeared yesterday in the New York Journal American and on the I.N.S.[93] ticker to the effect that "two top Canadians" had been mentioned by the Senate Sub-Committee on Internal Security. Newspapers here wished to discover the names of the two Canadians and the nature of such charges as might have been made against them. Mr. Pearson also wanted the State Department to know that he was meeting these enquiries, for the time being, by saying that we were trying to get information on these two points from Washington.

2. If the State Department could not secure the information within the next 24 hours, Mr. Pearson might be forced, under pressure, to tell newspapermen here that the State Department had been unsuccessful. I asked Mr. Matthews for his opinion as to whether it would be helpful to pass along this warning to the State Department at once. Mr. Matthews thought that it would be helpful; and he, therefore, undertook to get in touch with the State Department immediately and let them know what the Minister might be obliged to say in the event that they were unable to secure the names of the two Canadians and the evidence which had been presented to the Senate Sub-Committee.

1. This afternoon Raynor handed to Matthews an aide mémoire, the text of which is quoted below, asking on behalf of the committee information concerning residents of the United States mentioned during the Canadian investigations in 1946.

2. State Department were at pains to point out that the letter they had received from Senator McCarran was of an earlier date than the State Department's approach to the sub-committee requesting information on behalf of Canada.

3. The aide mémoire reads as follows:

In a letter dated August 15, 1951, Senator Pat McCarran, Chairman of the Internal Security Sub-Committee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, asked the Secretary of State to request the Canadian Government to make available to the Internal Security Sub-Committee the names of United States residents included in a list of people associated with the disclosures in 1946 of the Soviet code clerk, Igor Gouzenko.

Senator McCarran refers in his letter to a news dispatch by Richard H. Haviland in the Montreal Daily Star dated May 25, 1950, in which a statement by the Honorable Stuart Garson, Minister of Justice, is reported to the effect that a notebook which came to light during the course of the Canadian Espionage Investigation of 1946 was the object of study by the Ministry of Justice. According to Senator McCarran's letter there are 436 entries in all in this notebook and included among them are the names of 163 United States residents.

The Secretary of State would appreciate it if the Chargé d'Affaires Ad Interim of the Canadian Embassy would transmit Senator McCarran's request to appropriate officials in the Canadian Government and notify this department of the results of the inquiry so that Senator McCarran may be informed.

SENATE SUB-COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL SECURITY

Yesterday evening about 7 o'clock I had a telephone call from Mr. Matthews. He said that Hayden Raynor of the State Department had told him that a reply from the Senate Sub-Committee had now been received in the State Department. It this letter it was stated

(a) that the Sub-Committee were endeavouring to conduct their proceedings with "dignity and fairness";

(b) that there was nothing that the Sub-Committee could do to curb the use made by the press of evidence at public hearings of the Sub-Committee;

(c) that so far as executive sessions were concerned, the Sub-Committee had been making such arrangements to prevent unwarranted disclosures as had seemed appropriate;

(d) that the Sub-Committee would be willing to co-operate with the State Department or with us, through the State Department, in an exchange of information;

(e) that the Sub-Committee would gladly consult with the State Department as to how this co-operation could best be effected.

The letter contained no information about Canadians who have been named in hearings before the Sub-Committee or about the charges which have been preferred against them.

2. Yesterday afternoon the State Department also gave the Embassy an aide-mémoire transmitting a request for information from the Canadian authorities which had been made by the Sub-Committee on the 15th August. The text of the aide-mémoire is contained in teletype No. WA-3198 of the 23rd August, which is attached.

3. I told Mr. Matthews that Mr. Pearson had approved a brief and comparatively mild press release which was to be issued this morning at 10:30, if by that time we had not received any information. Mr. Matthews thought — and I agreed — that the Minister should be informed of what Matthews had been told by Hayden Raynor, so that he could decide whether the press release should be issued in its present form or altered. I then spoke over the telephone to Mr. Pearson. He said that, although he was annoyed by the tone and substance of the reply from the Senate Sub-Committee, he thought that we should not change our press release but should issue it as it stood.

4. This morning about 9:30 I had a further call from Mr. Matthews. He said that Ed Hadley, the Montreal Star's representative in Washington, had already heard of the reply from the Senate Sub-Committee and was writing a story about it for this afternoon's paper. Hadley seemed to have received a good deal more information from some source close to the Sub-Committee than our Embassy had been given. His story would represent the reply from the Sub-Committee as a complete rebuff to our request for information. This interpretation, to my mind, seems not unfair. Mr. Matthews thought that we should once again reconsider the text of the press release which we intended issuing. In your absence, I consulted with Mr. Ritchie and with Mr. Glazebrook. We all agreed that the press release might still go out in its original form. It went to the press at 10:30 this morning.[94]

5. Already newspapermen have heard of the existence of the reply from the Senate Sub-Committee and are beginning to question us about it. In answer to enquiries, Mr. Glazebrook, Miss Weiss and I are saying that we have heard from the State Department that a reply to our request has been made by the Senate Sub-Committee. However, we have not yet received the text of the reply and, until we do, we are not in a position to comment. I am not sure how long we will be able to hold this line; but I hope you will agree that it is what we should do for the time being.

6. I am sending copies of this memorandum to Mr. Glazebrook and to Miss Weiss.

SENATE SUB-COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL SECURITY

Following for the Chargé d'Affaires.

In reply to the aide mémoire transmitted to you by the State Department on August 23 on behalf of the Internal Security Sub-Committee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, please convey to the State Department an oral message along the lines set forth in paragraphs two and three of this message.

2. The information requested by Senator McCarran has already been transmitted to the appropriate U.S. Security authorities in conformity with established arrangements for co-operation in security matters of common interest to Canada and the United States.

[94] Voir/See Canada, Department of External Affairs, Press Releases, 1951, No. 39.

3. The State Department are of course aware of the existence of these arrangements for the exchange of security information of mutual concern and it may be recalled that the transmission to the U.S. Government of the particular information now requested by the Senate Sub-Committee was mentioned by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the House of Commons on May 2, 1950. Nevertheless for the convenience of the State Department [you] are repeating the names of the U.S. residents referred to in the Senate Sub-Committee's aide mémoire. (The list of these names is contained in my immediately following telegram).†

4. With respect to the suggestion in Senator McCarran's letter of August 22 to the State Department, communicated to you orally and referred to in your WA-3020 [sic] of August 24 concerning exchange of information, you should again point out to the State Department that the existing arrangement for exchange of information of common interest between the security authorities of the two countries has been well and satisfactorily established for a long time, as officers of the State Department should be well aware. We look forward to the continuance of this mutually satisfactory procedure.

5. In the circumstances it seems to us advisable that the "oral message" referred to above should be committed to writing and handed to the State Department with the list of names attached firmly to it.

2. Raynor is getting in touch with Humelsine the Deputy Under-Secretary, who is at present in San Francisco, by telephone to advise him that this information has been received. Humelsine is planning to discuss this matter with Senator McCarran over the weekend. State Department hope that as a result of the receipt of this information the atmosphere for Humelsine's discussions may be such that results will be produced.

3. Raynor referred to the suggestion contained in McCarran's letter to the State Department as reported in our WA-3202 of August 24, that the subcommittee would be glad to explore through the State Department a satisfactory arrangement for exchange of information between the subcommittee and the Canadian authorities. He inquired whether our expression of satisfaction with the existing arrangements for the exchange of information of common interest to the security authorities in each country implied that we did not wish to set up any special arrangements for exchange of information with the subcommittee and whether we would prefer any reply to our request for information concerning the reported reference at an executive session of the subcommittee to two Canadian officials to come through the existing channels.

4. I advised Raynor that I would seek instructions on these points but assured him that in so far as his second question was concerned the important thing so far as we were concerned was to obtain details of any charges that might have been made against Canadians and that the channel through which that information reached the Canadian Government would be a matter of little importance.[95]

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY AND POWER PROJECT

1. The Prime Minister, referring to the discussion at the meeting of February 22nd, 1951, said that the Chairman of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission had called on him to discuss future Canadian policy regarding the St. Lawrence waterway and power project, in view of Ontario's need for additional power and the possibility that the United States Congress would not endorse, during its current session, the 1941 Agreement on the combined waterway and power project.

Mr. St-Laurent had told Mr. Saunders that the government recognized Ontario's need for additional power by the end of 1956 and could be counted on to do everything possible, in the light of the relationship with the United States in this matter, to ensure that the power side of the St. Lawrence project was completed in time. In view of the situation in Congress, he had undertaken to discuss with the other members of the government, the possibility of taking early action looking to separate power development (by Ontario and New York) and construction of the waterway by Canada alone. It might be desirable to consider introducing in the House of Commons legislation enabling Canada to proceed with the construction of the waterway, making it clear at the same time that U.S. participation in this scheme would still be welcome. Mr. Saunders thought that U.S. opponents of the waterway scheme would reverse their attitude if it were made clear that Canada planned to undertake construction of the waterway at its own expense. He had also said that, should Congress fail to endorse the combined scheme this year, he believed that New York and Ontario would be prepared to build the power facilities and common works and that Ontario would, if necessary, be prepared to handle the expropriation of lands and the payment of damages on the Canadian side.

2. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said the Canadian Ambassador in Washington had reported that Congress, with only the House of Representatives so far considering the matter, might not approve the 1941 Agreement during its current session. He had also pointed out that, should the House of Representatives endorse the combined project and the Senate postpone action on it until the next session, it would be very difficult to obtain agreement to proceed with separate power development by Ontario and New York.

3. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and Minister of Defence Production pointed out that the U.S. Secretary of Commerce, in conversation, had accepted the fact that, should Congress not approve the combined project this year, Canada would proceed with the waterway on its own. He thought it inadvisable to indicate any intention to take separate Canadian action for another few weeks, until the intentions of Congress were clearer. Otherwise, there might be the criticism in the United States that Congress had not been given sufficient time to consider the U.S. position in the matter.

4. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the report of the Prime Minister regarding discussions he had had with the Chairman of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission, with regard to future Canadian policy on the St. Lawrence waterway and power project, and agreed that, until the intentions of the United States Congress became clearer, nothing be done for another few weeks to indicate the possibility of separate Canadian action on the project.

ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT

1. Yesterday Matthews had an opportunity to discuss the St. Lawrence project briefly with David Stowe, an administrative assistant to the President on the White House staff.

2. From this discussion it was apparent that the White House shares the general opinion that the prospects for approval at this session of Congress have become less favourable in recent weeks.

3. Matthews pointed out to Stowe the serious effect a prolonged delay would have on the Ontario power situation. He said that, if it became apparent that Congressional approval would not be forthcoming within a reasonable time, the Canadian authorities would have to consider the desirability of advocating the Ontario-New York power development project.

4. Stowe's immediate comment was that there would be little point in seeking power development separately from the seaway as long as Mr. Truman remained in the White House; the seaway had been for a long time a matter of great personal interest to the President, and the President regarded the power development as a matter of State interest rather than of national interest.

5. When asked whether it would make any difference to the President's attitude if Canada should decide to proceed with the development of the seaway on its own, Stowe was non-committal. It appeared as if the possibility of Canadian development of the seaway had not been considered seriously in the White House.

6. It is probable that Mr. Stowe gave an accurate picture of the present thinking of the President on this matter. I think it is important, therefore, that if the Canadian Government decides to support Ontario and New York in their plan to proceed with power development, either with or without Canadian development of the seaway, the ground should first be cleared with the President. If this is not done before any such scheme is given publicity the President might make a statement opposing the Ontario-New York development that would make it impossible for him to change his stand at a later date.

7. If it becomes clear that Congress will not approve the joint project at this session as a result of its defeat in committee or on the floor of either House, it will doubtless be necessary for the Canadian Government to make at once a statement of its intentions. I think that any statement indicating support of power development by Ontario and New York should be preceded by a message from the Prime Minister to the President setting forth the urgent need for more power and saying as much as can be said about a Canadian seaway. In such an event action would have to be taken every quickly. Alternatively, the issue might be raised in advance in a communication from the Prime Minister to Mr. Truman or by me with Mr. Acheson; a written communication should accompany any oral representations which might be made.

My WA-1951 of May 9th. St. Lawrence Project.

1. I mentioned to the Secretary of State today the probability that if it became evident that the joint project would not be approved at this session of Congress the Canadian Government would then support a separate power development by New York and Ontario. I also mentioned the desire of the Ontario authorities for the Federal Government to declare itself on this issue. On the first point Mr. Acheson remarked that when the matter was last mentioned in the Cabinet a slightly more optimistic account of the prospects of Congressional action had been given. I gathered, however, that this primarily related to the hopes for an affirmative vote by the House Public Works Committee after their projected tour of inspection. On the second point he urged that no public statement of intentions should be issued in Ottawa, at any rate until the House Committee had reached a decision, since he thought that a statement on our side might have an adverse effect on the decision.

2. I told him that I was mentioning the matter at this time since if the project were shelved I might be seeking to enlist his support with the President in persuading Mr. Truman to drop his opposition to a separate power development.

3. This conversation supports the recommendation made in paragraph 7 of my message under reference.

ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT

1. Since my return from Ottawa we have received further information on the thinking in the White House about the prospects of approval of the joint project and the tactics which might be pursued. Matthews has discussed the issues with Charles

Murphy, Special Counsel to the President, and Stowe, Administrative Assistant to him, and the Canadian Desk in the State Department has informed us of a further discussion yesterday which they have had with Bell of Mr. Truman's staff. While the views expressed may not be based on any fresh consideration by the President himself, they come from those on whom he would rely for advice.

2. Both Murphy and Bell say that the White House still hopes that favourable action will be taken by Congress on the joint project, and Murphy implies that some political manoeuvring is being undertaken to this end. Murphy and Stowe express the personal opinion that the Administration will not agree to a separate power development unless assurance is given that the seaway will be constructed by Canada on the ground that without the inducement of the power development enough votes would never be secured for approval of the seaway by Congress.

3. All three urge very strongly that nothing should be said in Canada about either a separate power development, or the possibility of the seaway being built by Canada with the power project undertaken by New York and Ontario, unless the joint project is rejected by the House Committee or by one House of Congress.

4. Should an unfavourable vote take place, they urge consultation on how best to carry the project forward before the Canadian Government takes any public position. If this were to happen, the Administration would be likely to support, as the second best method, the New York-Ontario development plus a Canadian undertaking to develop the seaway plus a guarantee of permanent navigation rights on equal terms. This is the line of argument that we must expect in such a contingency and with which we must be prepared to deal. If no undertaking could be given about the possibility of an all-Canadian seaway, we would clearly have difficulty in getting the President to change his stand against the Ontario-New York power project.

5. We have pointed out that in the event of an adverse vote by the Public Works Committee (which would certainly kill the joint project for this session and almost certainly for this Congress) the Canadian Government will be under great pressure from the Ontario Government and in Parliament to issue promptly a statement of its intentions. This has resulted in an informal suggestion on behalf of the State Department and White House that we should enter into discussions before the vote has been taken in the Committee so as to concert the plans of the two governments. Since the Committee is expected to vote soon after its projected tour, it is proposed that these discussions might take place next week. One difficulty that I see in this suggestion is that we shall be under immediate pressure to state the attitude of the Canadian Government towards an all-Canadian seaway, and this would appear to involve a tentative Cabinet decision on the action to be taken in a situation which may never occur. We have, therefore, been very reserved in commenting on the proposal.

6. It is in any event important that I should receive some statement of your views on the contents of this telegram and on my messages WA-2020 of May 14th and WA-1951 of May 9th, which are related to it.

This was discussed in the Cabinet last week[96] but no decision was reached on the question of entering into such discussions, pending further consideration in Cabinet of the economic feasibility of an all-Canadian waterway. The Interdepartmental Committee has been asked to provide economic data as quickly as possible, in the light of which the Cabinet can give further study to this question. In the meantime it will, of course, be impossible to have discussions this week with the United States authorities, or to make arrangements for such discussions to be held later. It is hoped that the Interdepartmental Committee's report can be placed before Cabinet at the first of next week.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY PROJECT; POSSIBLE CONSTRUCTION OF AN ALL CANADIAN WATERWAY

1. At its meeting of May 24, the Cabinet had before it a report from the Ambassador in Washington giving the views of members of the White House staff on the attitude that would probably be adopted by the United States Administration if the House of Representatives Public Works Committee were to vote against the 1941 Agreement.

Should an unfavourable vote take place they urged consultation on how best to carry the project forward before the Canadian Government makes public its position. They thought the Administration would then be likely to support, as the second best method, the New York-Ontario power development together with:

[96] Le 24 mai 1951./May 24, 1951.

(a) A Canadian undertaking to develop the deep waterway, and

(b) A guarantee of permanent navigation rights on equal terms.

If these conditions were not met, they thought it unlikely that the President would abandon his opposition to the New York-Ontario power project.

The U.S. officials had proposed joint discussions with a view to concerting the plans of the two governments. Mr. Wrong requested the government's views about the discussions pointing out that they would involve his indicating the government's position on an all Canadian waterway.

2. The Cabinet decided that, before taking any decisions, a report should be prepared by the Interdepartmental Committee on the St. Lawrence Waterway on the cost and value of the joint project and of an all Canadian deep waterway and on the effect of tolls on the ability of either project to become self-supporting. The report of the Interdepartmental Committee is attached.

3. After the last discussion in the Cabinet information was received from General McNaughton of views expressed by members of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence which suggested that the President might be more ready to give clearance for separate power development without any definite commitment as to the Canadian waterway than was suggested by the advice given to Mr. Wrong. This has now been referred to Mr. Wrong who has checked the matter again and he reports that the information as originally given in his despatch of May 22† seems still to be correct. He gives the following information as to the position in Washington:

> "The general consensus of Administration officials is that there is no real objection to the power development aspect of the project, but that the support for power development must be used to obtain endorsement of the seaway.
> It now appears unlikely that there will be a vote in the House Public Works Committee before the first week in July as several of the Committee are absent from Washington. Administration officials are still hopeful that Congressional approval of the project will be forthcoming. However, this optimism does not seem to be based on any definite timetable, and Mr. McWhorter, for example, made some comments recently which indicated that he thought the project would more likely be approved during the second session of the 82nd Congress. Federal Power Commission officials appear to think that Ontario might seek some other sources of power to meet their needs until the St. Lawrence Project can proceed on a joint basis on the assumption that there may only be another year's delay. Moreover, since the Administration is trying to emphasize the seaway aspect of the project, our emphasis on the urgency of Ontario's requirement for power is inclined to give rise to misunderstanding and the impression that we are working at cross purposes."[97]

CONFIDENTIAL [n.d.]

RE THE ALL CANADIAN WATERWAY

1. Description of All Canadian Waterway. The only difference between the so-called "All Canadian Waterway" and the Waterway proposed to be constructed under the 1941 Canada-U.S. Agreement is that the navigation works — the locks, navigation canals, etc. — in the International Rapids Section of the St. Lawrence River would be on the Canadian side of the International Boundary instead of on the United States side.

2. Preliminary Action Necessary. In order to proceed with an "All Canadian Waterway" the following procedure would be necessary:

(i) Obtain consent of President Truman to a joint submission to the International Joint Commission under Article III of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 for approval of plans for development of power in the International Rapids Section either by Ontario and New York or by Canada and New York.

(ii) Create an Engineering Board to agree on the plan of improvement to be carried out in the International Section. Any procedure other than under Article III of the 1909 Treaty would involve Congressional approval. To avoid complications definite plans agreed upon must be submitted to the International Joint Commission. The plans presently proposed by N.Y. State and Ontario do not include features considered essential, having in mind the adequate protection of down river interests.

(iii) A decision by the Canadian Government as to whether the Power Works in the International Rapids Section would be built by Canada or Ontario. If the latter, then the necessary legislation would have to be prepared to give the Province the right to carry out such a development. Also, the respective rights of Canada and the Province would have to be defined to take care of any approval of plans, etc. entering into the design and construction of the Project.

(iv) Submission for approval to the IJC of the plan proposed and agreed upon by the Engineering Board discussed in Subsection (ii) above.

(v) Organization of necessary Engineering and Administrative Staffs to carry out the proposed works.

3. Time Element. From statements recently made by the Chairman of the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission there appears to be little doubt that in order to avoid a serious shortage of hydro electric power in Ontario, power from the International Rapids Section should be available by December, 1956, at the latest. Such a power shortage would result in the need for the construction of additional steam plants with consequent higher power costs. Assuming assent of the U.S. is obtained by July 1st to proceed with the construction of an "All Canadian Waterway", it is estimated that the earliest date power might be available is December 1957 based on the following time schedule:

(i) Negotiations with U.S. leading to creation of Engineering Board, including preparation of terms of reference to such Board—4 months

(ii) Deliberations of Engineering Board and preparation of applications to IJC—8 months

(iii) Deliberations of IJC including the necessary public hearings, preparation of report, including conditions, etc. — 1 year

(iv) Construction period required to bring in first block of power from International Section—4 years, 6 months

(v) Preparation of legislation, legal studies and setting up of the necessary Administrative and Engineering Organizations (possibly a Crown company under the Department of Transport to construct and operate the navigation facilities and to be self-supporting) required for carrying out the work estimated to require from 1 year to 18 months, would have to be carried on simultaneously with the period devoted to the studies of the Engineering Board and deliberations of the IJC—6 years, 6 months

4. Obviously, the times allowed in the above schedule for the various stages preliminary to start of construction may vary considerably from those estimated but it certainly would be impossible to shorten the total time by any great amount. Even with a decision made by July 1st, an accelerated programme of construction of the "Power" and "Common" works will be required and availability of materials and labour must be assured if power is to be made available by December 1957. Even if the "Navigation" works are proceeded with at the same time as the "Power" and "Common" works, through navigation could not be available before the spring of 1959.

5. Costs. A comparison of estimated costs of the 1941 Project and the "All Canadian Waterway", based on December, 1950, prices, is given below:

(i) First Cost to Complete

	With 1941 Project	All Canadian Waterway
Chargeable to Navigation
Canada	$ 60,374,000	$245,083,000
U.S.	324,062,000	90,288,000
	$384,436,000	$335,371,000
Chargeable to Power
Ontario	159,853,000	201,338,500
New York	159,853,000	201,338,500
Totals	$704,142,000	$738,048,000

(ii) Estimated Annual Capital Expenditures required by Government of Canada based on tentative six year construction programme

1st year of construction	$ 6,994,000	$ 17,120,000
2nd year of construction	16,002,000	32,490,000
3rd year of construction	30,039,000	46,400,000
4th year of construction	40,319,000	56,619,000
5th year of construction	49,416,000	66,376,000
6th year of construction	30,105,000	39,730,000
Total	$172,875,000	$258,735,000
To be paid to Canada
By Ontario	112,501,000
By Ont. & N.Y.		13,652,000 *
Net Capital Expenditures for Navigation	$ 60,374,000	$245,083,000

(iii) Estimated Annual Charges — On new Works for Navigation Only — (interest rate 3%).

Including interest on total cost (including interest during construction) depreciation, operation and maintenance.

Works below Lake Erie
Canada	$ 4,130,000	$ 10,700,000
U.S.	9,700,000	50,000
Total	$ 13,830,000	$ 10,750,000
Works above Lake Erie
Grand Total	$ 16,740,000	$ 13,660,000

* It has been assumed that with the "All Canadian Waterway" Ontario and New York will be charged with the cost of improving the International Section for "Power Alone". The saving effected by improvement for "Navigation and Power Combined" is estimated at $13,652,000 and it is therefore assumed that this amount will be paid to Canada by Ontario and New York.

6. The assumptions made in arriving at the division of cost as between Canada, United States, Ontario and New York State are given in Appendix A.

7. The total cost to Canada, chargeable to navigation, will be increased from that shown above by any amount Canada pays Quebec on account of "Common Works" already constructed in the Soulanges Section (Beauharnois Development). Based on the Agreement made in 1941 this additional cost to Canada would be $7,972,500. Canada's cost would be further increased if it should be decided to pay Ontario anything on account of similar "Common Works".

8. Economics. Based on a report prepared by the Economic Research Division of the Department of Trade and Commerce on the St. Lawrence Waterway in relation to the Canadian economy, the annual savings in transportation costs on potential traffic on the Waterway are estimated at $48,000,000 as shown on Table I. More important even than these savings is the fact that the opening of the Waterway would have the immediate effect of increasing the sale of Labrador iron ore by at least 10,000,000 tons annually over the volume that would otherwise obtain, by opening markets that now cannot be reached economically by any alternative route. In addition to these savings, there are other and greater benefits which cannot be measured in dollars — value of Waterway for defence — economy resulting from cheaper iron and steel — stimulus to industrial expansion and a greater national income, with increased production of iron ore as an outstanding example.

9. An estimate of the potential traffic on the Canal System of the St. Lawrence Waterway, prepared for the study referred to above, is given on Table II. This shows a total annual potential movement for the St. Lawrence Canals of about 45,000,000 tons. This estimate is based mainly on traffic actually moving over existing routes in 1947, with an additional allowance for Labrador iron ore.

10. Tolls. The annual savings in transportation costs are estimated at $48,000,000 while the annual charges applicable to navigation with the 1941 Project are estimated at $16,740,000 and with the "All Canadian Waterway" at $13,660,000. The amounts of these totals chargeable to the works below Lake Erie are $13,830,000 and $10,750,000 respectively. A hypothetical schedule of tolls and revenues from this latter portion of the Waterway, based on the study of the Research Division of the Department of Trade and Commerce referred to above, is given on Table III and shows a prospective annual toll revenue of $14,194,000. This is more than sufficient to meet the annual charges on this portion of the Waterway — either with the 1941 Project or the "All Canadian Waterway". Very minor unit toll charges on the traffic through the Sault Canals (over 90,000,000 tons per year) would cover the annual charges in the part of the Waterway above Lake Erie, estimated at $2,910,000 per year.

11. Material and Labour Requirements. The construction of the Waterway Project, exclusive of Power house machinery and equipment, will require the use of certain critical materials as shown in the following Table:

Material		United States	Canada
Reinforcing Steel	— tons	36,000	34,200
Structural Steel	— tons	68,600	40,000
Copper	— tons	2,200	2,200
Cement	— bbls.	3,780,000	3,850,000
Lumber	— MBM	48,700	70,000

12. The use of these materials will be spread over five or six years. In so far as Canada is concerned, the total average annual steel requirements would be a little more than 2% of the present total annual Canadian consumption, and the average annual cement requirements would be about 4% of the present total annual use. The abandonment of plans for proceeding with the Waterway Project would not result in a saving in the use of all the critical materials noted above as alternative power developments will be necessary.

13. Based on an accelerated construction schedule designed to complete the total Project in five years, it is estimated that it would require an approximate average of about 15,000 American and Canadian workmen on the job. Of these an average of 9,500 would be employed on the Canadian side of the International Boundary.

14. Montreal Harbour and St. Lawrence Ship Channel. The completion of the St. Lawrence Waterway Project will advance the date on which extensive work in the River below Montreal will be required in order to provide for future expansion of the facilities in Montreal Harbour. This is under study at the present time by an Engineering Committee set up by the Department of Transport. This Committee has not reported to date but it is understood that the plan under consideration is such that the works required could not be constructed until the power resources in the Lachine Section of the River are developed. Also, until the Committee reports, the cost of the proposed works is not known but it is believed the cost of the works in the immediate vicinity of the Harbour of Montreal will be between $75,000,000 and $100,000,000.

[APPENDICE A/APPENDIX A]

ASSUMPTIONS MADE AS TO DIVISION OF COST OF WATERWAY

The 1941 Canada-U.S. Agreement provides for the division of the task of construction of the works required to complete the Waterway as between the two countries. There is not, however, any agreement providing for the division of cost of the "All Canadian Waterway" or of the division of cost of either Project as between Canada and Ontario. The following assumptions in this regard have been made in setting up the cost data shown in Table I.

(a) In all cases.

The cost of improvement for "Navigation Alone" in the Lachine Section has been used in all cases. If a joint navigation and power project is adopted, the cost to navigation should be reduced.

(b) With 1941 Joint Project in International Section.

(i) Division between Canada and U.S. as provided for in 1941 Agreement.

(ii) Ontario's costs to be based on same percentage division of cost of "Common" works as provided for in 1941 Agreement.

(iii) New York's costs to be same as those of Ontario.

(c) With "All Canadian Waterway".

(i) Canada will pay for the works in the Canadian Section of the St. Lawrence River and the deepening of the Welland Ship Canal.

(ii) U.S. will pay for the necessary widening of the Thousand Islands Section and the works in the Upper Lakes Channels.

(iii) New York State and Ontario will each pay 50% of the cost of improving the International Rapids Section for "Power Alone".

[a] Includes consideration of all traffic using any part of the waterway between Montreal and the Lakehead, whatever the country of origin or destination. Attempts to determine the portions of the savings accruing ultimately to Canadian, United States, or overseas nationals have proven inconclusive because in each case the determining factors may change with changes in demand and supply.

[b] It is estimated that not much more than 10,000,000 tons a year would move inland by alternative routes without the Waterway, and that completion of the Waterway would permit the same tonnage to move by this route at the indicated saving in transportation costs before payment of tolls. More important than this saving, as far as ore production is concerned, is the fact that the Waterway would open new markets further inland that would take at least another 10,000,000 tons annually at once, and probably considerably more in the course of time.

(Based on similar table in report on "St. Lawrence Waterway and the Canadian Economy" prepared by the Economic Research Division of the Department of Trade and Commerce, January 1951).

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND POWER PROJECT

21. The Prime Minister reported that, on July 26th, 1951, the U.S. House Public Works Committee had shelved the St. Lawrence seaway resolution by a vote of 15 to 12. Although advocates of the project in the United States had indicated that they would attempt to have the matter reconsidered before Congress recessed in September, there seemed very little likelihood that this could be brought about.

Consideration should now be given to the desirability of Canada proceeding alone with the construction of the seaway or, alternatively, of obtaining U.S. consent to the power project being proceeded with independently by the Province of Ontario and the State of New York on the understanding that Canada would undertake construction of the seaway at a later date.

22. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said he had received a communication from the Chairman of the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission stating that the Province of Ontario was in a position to assume complete financial responsibility for the power development project if it were found impossible to proceed at this time with the joint seaway-power development. In view of the negative action taken by the U.S. Congressional Committee and because of Ontario's apparent desire to proceed at all cost, it might now be advisable to revise the federal-provincial cost sharing assumptions on which the 1941 proposals had been based. From information now available, it seemed clear that, even if the Province of Ontario assumed complete financial responsibility for the power development, including the diversion of navigable channels and canals which would be made necessary by such power development, it would still be possible to provide a considerable amount of electric energy at very reasonable rates.

In order to gain first-hand information respecting all the factors involved, he suggested that an ad hoc Cabinet committee be established to review the whole problem in the light of recent developments.

23. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion:

(a) agreed that a special Cabinet committee comprising the Ministers of Trade and Commerce, Transport and Resources and Development, review the problem of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project in the light of recent developments; and,

(b) deferred decision on any further action to be taken pending a report by the special committee.

Memorandum from Special Assistant to Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], August 3, 1951

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

As you suggested, I have discussed with Norman Robertson the present state of this subject.

2. He believes that the chief purpose of the special Cabinet committee which has been established, consisting of Mr. Howe, Mr. Chevrier and Mr. Winters, is to allow Mr. Howe to cross-examine the experts on a number of engineering and financial questions. The committee is to meet for the first time next Tuesday, the 7th August. Since Mr. Winters will be on holiday, only two Ministers will be present, according to the present arrangements. Mr. Robertson thinks that it would be advisable for you to attend the meeting and he feels sure that this would be more than agreeable to your colleagues. He suggests that you get in touch with Mr. Chevrier (who is making the arrangements) or, alternatively, that you ask him to do so. Perhaps you would let me know what you decide on this point, so that in any event I can inform Mr. Robertson.

3. It would seem that Mr. Howe wishes to investigate whether there is not room to transfer some of the costs which have hitherto been considered as jointly attributable to the power and navigation aspects of the scheme to the power side exclusively. This would, of course, have the advantage of reducing the commitment of the Federal Government. It would also permit some delay in initiating the navigation development, since the province of Ontario and the state of New York could be told that they could proceed with the power development, if they also proceeded with some of the common works and build them in such a way as to enable them to be linked to the seaway when it was built. Mr. Robertson believes that Mr. Howe, although in favour of building an all-Canadian seaway, would like to postpone construction for a year or two. You will not need to be reminded that the power development can hardly be delayed if the expected shortage in the province of Ontario is to be met. However, the engineers estimate that the time needed for constructing the seaway will be considerably shorter than that needed to construct the hydro-electric installations. For this reason, there is conceivably some opportunity for delaying the seaway, even if the Administration in Washington exact from us a pledge to go forward with it.

4. It was decided at the Cabinet meeting on Tuesday that no Government statement on this subject should be made until there had been an opportunity for a high level discussion with the United States authorities. The Prime Minister has told Mr. Robertson that he would be willing to go to Washington in order to take up this matter with Mr. Truman some time later this month after he has come back from the west. However, he has not yet made a decision. On other grounds as well, I gather that he would like to see Mr. Truman. It is now some eighteen months, I think, since they last met.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Following for Matthews from Pearson, Begins: Bliss came to see me this morning at his request to enquire whether there were any recent developments here of which he should be aware before attending the meeting at the White House next Monday. He did not know what the purpose of this meeting was but he suspected that the White House might be intending to propose some new stratagem for obtaining Congressional approval of the joint scheme.

2. He wanted, in particular, to be sure no decision had yet been taken here to go forward with an all-Canadian navigation scheme. I assured him on this point and added that it would be some little while before the examination by Cabinet of the problem (which must precede a decision) would be complete. On the other hand, I stressed that we could not defer this enquiry, even if the White House had some new wrinkle to propose for securing Congressional approval. We had all along preferred the joint scheme and would still prefer it. But we could not live on hope indefinitely; and we were now virtually convinced that Congressional approval could not be obtained this year. Moran, who was with me, underlined the importance of beginning the power development with the least possible delay in view of the anticipated shortages in Ontario. Bliss was somewhat inclined to think that pressure for the development of the St. Lawrence was confined to Ontario. I indicated, however, that from recent surveys which I had seen there seemed to be a very high degree of unanimity on this subject throughout the country.

3. Bliss gave it as his personal opinion that, although it would cause Mr. Truman some political difficulty, he would be unable to oppose a request from Canada for permission for Ontario and New York State to go ahead with the power development and for the Canadian Government to construct a deep waterway on the Canadian side. I suggested that, conceivably, such a project might be handled in two stages. The hydro-electric scheme might be begun as soon as the International Joint Commission had given its consent, whereas a year or two more might elapse before a start was made on the deep waterway on the Canadian side. This suggestion was advanced very casually; but you should know of it since, conceivably, Bliss may mention it in Washington.

4. The Cabinet committee which has been set up to consider this subject will meet on Tuesday afternoon, the 7th August. I should be grateful to receive your report of the meeting at the White House by Tuesday noon at the latest. Ends.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY[98]

Following for Pearson from Matthews, Begins: Haselton arranged a meeting with Murphy and Bell at the White House yesterday afternoon in order to let us know in a general way their estimate of the prospect of securing Congressional approval of the project at this session, and to explore informally what might be done, failing approval, to advance the project either as a separate power development or as a power development coupled with an all-Canadian seaway. Assistant Secretary of Commerce Davis, who has been primarily responsible for co-ordinating the administration's efforts with Congress, and Don Bliss were also present. Cox and I attended from the Embassy.

2. Davis assured us that the administration is still hopeful of securing Congressional approval at this session. He said that a new bill would shortly be introduced in the House and that prospective changes in the composition of the House Public Works Committee might make it possible to have the bill reported favourably. They are also hopeful of holding hearings in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, either as a separate bill, or as an amendment to the Mutual Security Bill (as proposed by Senators Wiley, Aiken and Moody), before the end of this month. In view of this, therefore, Davis considers that the picture in Congress will at least have cleared by the middle of September. However, he agreed that approval in committee is still far short of Congressional approval as there would still be several obstacles to hurdle. However, he still definitely considers that there is a possibility of Congressional approval this year.

3. On the other hand, Murphy and Bell were obviously not even as optimistic as Davis. They mentioned various stumbling blocks including the difficulty of obtaining conference agreement if the bill were attached to the Mutual Security Bill, as has been suggested in the Senate. (Such amendment might not be permissible in the House because of House rules on "germaneness".) Murphy said that the administration's first preference was the joint project but they also felt that the important thing was to get the seaway built. They seemed prepared to discuss the possibility of a separate development of the two aspects of the project by stages, but pointed out, first, that proponents of the seaway in Congress were opposed to separate power development because they feared the loss of the support for the combined project which came from the more obvious need for power, and secondly, that the President was strongly and publicly committed to the combined project or nothing. Furthermore, it would be difficult and complicated to work out an arrangement which would provide for the construction of the power works on the United States side without federal funds and which would, at the same time, fit in with the administration's public power policy. However, Murphy thought that if Congressional approval of the whole project could not be obtained, it would be useless to seek approval of funds from Congress for a federal power development. The alternative would be Federal Power Commission approval of New York State development subject to conditions, in the license, protecting other states. On account of his public statements saying he was in favour of a seaway and power development or nothing, Murphy said that the President would obviously have to have something in the way of a commitment by Canada to undertake the seaway within some reasonable period before he would be able to support a reference of a separate power scheme to the International Joint Commission or its approval by the Federal Power Commission. Moreover, such a commitment would help to satisfy the proponents of the seaway in Congress if the power aspect were to be developed first.

4. The nature of such a commitment was, of course, only briefly explored. Bliss suggested that perhaps a simple public statement of policy by the Canadian Government would suffice. However, Murphy appeared to think that something more, in the way of an exchange of notes or even an "executive agreement", would be preferable.

5. Separate power development by Ontario and New York would evidently introduce certain problems on the United States side which might result in delay. Unless a suitable agreement on the ownership and control of the United States power works could be reached, Davis considered that Congress might take affirmative action to block power development on the St. Lawrence by New York State on the ground that it struck at the public power policy in this country. Murphy and Bell did not seem to take this quite so seriously, thinking the opposition could be satisfied by conditions in the authority given to New York, but they pointed out that the drafting of suitable conditions might take time.

6. The possibility that Congressional approval of United States participation in the seaway might be obtained after the power project had been begun, but before the seaway was undertaken, was also suggested. I said that I would refer this suggestion to you and that in my personal opinion approval of such participation might be possible before work had commenced on the seaway, but that it was unlikely that we would be prepared to accept a change in plans after any extensive (and expensive) preparations for construction of an all-Canadian seaway had begun.

7. Murphy and Bell, by constant questions as to the possibility of Canada commencing construction of the seaway alone, and undertaking to do so at an early date, gave the impression that in their opinion the President would approve New York Development of the power if we could give such an undertaking. Asked what delays might arise if the Canadian Government decided to proceed alone, I said there inevitably would be delays arising from the change of route and there might be further delays owing to scarcity of men and materials.

8. Bell then said he was convinced that the United States would give every assistance in granting us priorities in materials, might be able to assist us in finding men and, if the U.S. dollar content of the project was a stumbling block, could help us finance the project by loans from the Export-Import Bank. They said that, after studying the problem and endorsing it as an urgent defence requirement, Defence Mobiliser Wilson had undertaken to provide for the joint project, whatever priorities would be necessary to ensure that adequate materials would be available. In view of the statements by Wilson and Secretary of Defence Marshall before the House Public Works Committee, I think that there would be no difficulty in obtaining whatever cooperation is required. Moreover, if the United States want a firm undertaking by Canada to build the seaway within a reasonable period before proceeding with a separate power development, we would undoubtedly be able to obtain firm assurances of whatever assistance or cooperation we would require.

9. I said that the Cabinet Committee and the government would be studying this problem fully and would probably have to reach a decision in anticipation of a full discussion in the House of Commons when Parliament reassembles early in October. Meanwhile, it appears that the administration's efforts to obtain Congressional approval will continue and a clearer picture, which should be more conclusive than a vote merely in the House Public Works Committee, will probably emerge before the end of September. It was agreed that in the meantime it would be better to avoid any public statement of a Canadian decision to build the seaway alone.

10. While the discussion was somewhat rambling and not very conclusive, it was interesting to note that Murphy and Bell of the White House did not, repeat not, seem very hopeful of securing Congressional approval of the project at this session. Nor did they appear to entertain seriously the prospect of continuing the attempt to obtain approval at the next session. On the other hand, they did seem prepared to recommend to the President a separate project provided there could be some assurance that the seaway would be undertaken within a reasonable period. They undertook to explore what sort of arrangement they would like to make with us in this respect. I think that another such discussion could be useful in a couple of weeks or so. If you concur, I would appreciate having your views as to what direction such a discussion should take. Ends.

Memorandum from Secretary to Cabinet to Prime Minister

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY PROJECT

The ad hoc committee recently appointed by Cabinet to look into the possibility of going ahead with an all-Canadian seaway development, held a meeting on Tuesday, August 7. The meeting was attended by Mr. Howe, Mr. Chevrier, Mr. Abbott and Mr. Pearson. Representatives of the Departments of Transport, Resources and Development, Trade and Commerce, Finance and External Affairs were also present for part of the meeting.

After considering the problem and estimates of the costs involved, the Committee was of opinion that the division of cost between navigation and power on which the 1941 agreement was predicated should be abandoned. The power shortage in Ontario is becoming increasingly acute so that even if that province assumed full financial responsibility for many of the so-called common works, the cost of power to be developed would still be very reasonable. In the light of the recent shelving of the St. Lawrence project by the U.S. House Public Works Committee, there seemed little likelihood that the seaway could be proceeded with during the next few years unless Canada took action alone. If this course were adopted, the proportionate financial burden on the Federal government would obviously be heavier than under the joint project even if no account is taken of the fact that the total costs of the all-Canadian route are estimated to be approximately $34 million greater than those of the joint U.S.-Canada route.

It was agreed that the Government of Ontario might be asked informally whether it would be willing to assume with New York on a 50/50 basis all expenditures involved in the power development of the International Rapids, including the cost of canals and locks required for 14 foot navigation and of channelling required in the river bed to allow for 27 foot navigation. The total cost of providing for the power development and the maintenance of 14 foot navigation, without considering the seaway, would be $381.8 million. This would involve, of course, the construction of 14 foot canals and locks around the dams and certain hydraulic channelling of the river bed. Insofar as the canal and locks are concerned, the Committee felt that Ontario and New York should not be asked to assume more than the cost of providing for 14 foot navigation, but that since the river bed would in any case have to be channelled for hydraulic purposes, Ontario and New York should assume the cost of providing a channel which would serve the needs of both power and deepsea navigation. It is estimated that a deepsea channel of this sort would cost approximately $21 million more than a purely hydraulic channel. On this basis, the total cost to Ontario and New York (to be shared on a 50/50 basis) of developing the International Rapids section, would be $402.7 million and the net cost to the Federal Government for the same section $105.9 million.

The Committee agreed that Mr. Howe and Mr. Chevrier should see Mr. Saunders the following day to obtain his concurrence in the proposal outlined above. It was thought that, as a first step it should be ascertained whether Ontario would agree to the proposed allocation of costs for the International Rapids section. If Ontario proved ready to cooperate on this basis, then the Province of Quebec should be approached with a view to seeking its concurrence in a joint seaway and power development at Lachine. It was pointed out that the seaway at Lachine could be proceeded with alone at a cost to the Federal Government of $98.2 million. If, however, Quebec agreed to develop power concurrently and to accept the method of allocating costs as between power and navigation which it was expected would be acceptable to Ontario, then the cost to the Federal Government might be reduced as low as $53 million. The cost to Quebec is estimated to be $235 million for the development of approximately 1.2 million horsepower. It was felt that Quebec would be anxious to develop power at Lachine if the seaway is proceeded with, since the cost of power to the province would be increased substantially if the seaway were proceeded with now and power developed later. I am not sure, however, that it will be possible to obtain Quebec's approval on the suggested division of costs. It seems more likely that a compromise may have to be worked out whereby the cost to the Federal Government would lie somewhere between $53 and $98 million and the cost to Quebec reduced by the same margin.

The allocation of costs for the whole project on the basis outlined above (not taking into account harbour improvements and work which would have to be done on the lower St. Lawrence) would be as set out hereunder:

DIVISION OF COSTS

(all figures in millions of dollars at price level of December 1950)

	Can.	Ont. Que. N.Y.	U.S.
Upper Lakes and Thousand Islands improvements			90.3[1]
Welland Canal	1.3[2]
International Rapids
Power		402.7[3] (Ont. and New York)
Navigation	105.9[4]
Lake St. Francis	2.5
Soulanges	37.1
Lachine[5]
Power		235.0 (Que.)
Navigation	53.0
	199.8	637.7	90.3

[1] This work, which is not urgent, will probably be undertaken by the United States.

(2) Control levels of Welland are now 24 feet. Deepening to 27 feet need not be undertaken in the immediate future.

(3) To be borne on a 50/50 basis by Ontario and New York. The cost of providing power and 14 foot navigation would be $381.8 million. The figure of $402.7 million includes the cost of a river-bed channel navigable by deepsea shipping as opposed to the purely hydraulic channel included in the $381.8 million.

(4) This is a net total. It excludes the $13.6 million to be paid to the Federal Government by Ontario and New York due to elimination of necessity to provide for 14 foot canal and locks. Also excluded is the expenditure of $20.9 million, representing the difference between the cost of a purely hydraulic river-bed channel and a navigable 27 foot channel, which it is suggested should be borne jointly by Ontario and New York.

(5) These figures do not include the cost of the proposed railway tunnel under the river. If power is not developed concurrently at Lachine, it is estimated that the seaway in this area will cost $98.2 million.

The figures set out above are based on the assumption that both the seaway and the power developments can be proceeded with more or less concurrently. If power is developed first and the seaway later, the net cost to the Federal Government of a deep seaway in the International Rapids section would be approximately $14 million greater. This is illustrated in the comparative table set out hereunder:

	International Rapids
	Power alone*	Extra for Navigation	Total
Power alone	381.8	—	381.8
Combined power & navigation	381.8	126.8	508.6
Power first: navigation later	381.8	140.9	522.7

* half to be borne by New York.

Although it was agreed that an understanding with Ontario should be sought before approaching the Province of Quebec, it was pointed out that there was some urgency in seeking Quebec's approval since that Province was now planning additional power developments which might be either at Beauharnois or on the Ottawa river rather than at Lachine. However, if the seaway were to be proceeded with, the Province of Quebec might think it advisable to develop Lachine first. If and when concurrence is obtained from the governments of Ontario and Quebec, it was suggested that the U.S. administration should then be approached with a view to obtaining its approval in order that the required authorizations might be given to the State of New York. If all these negotiations are successful, it is suggested that appropriate steps be taken to terminate the 1941 agreement.

Insofar as financing is concerned, it was thought that this had best be done through the issue of debentures by some suitable body corporate to be established by the Federal Government for the purpose. As you know, it was suggested some time ago by the Interdepartmental Committee that the annual charges arising out of the seaway could be met by the imposition of tolls on a relative modest scale.

The question of tolls is one which was touched on only briefly during the discussion at the Cabinet Committee meeting but which, I think, should be considered rather carefully. It seems clear that the greater proportion of these tolls, if established, would be paid by U.S. rather than by Canadian shipping. The various cost elements set out above do not include harbour improvements and other works which will probably be necessary in the lower St. Lawrence. No detailed estimates are yet available as to what these costs might be nor what proportion of them might properly be chargeable as part of the real costs of the seaway, but it is believed that the cost of the works in the immediate vicinity of the harbour of Montreal alone would be between $75 and $100 million. It seems to me that the toll system should be made to bear as much of the annual charges on the total capital expenditures involved (including harbour and channel developments) as is consistent with sound transportation economics. Furthermore, there would seem to be a better chance of successfully establishing an adequate toll rate now rather than to establish first a low rate and then attempt to increase it at a later date.

I thought that Mr. Howe and Mr. Chevrier would wish to report on their discussion with Mr. Saunders at today's Cabinet meeting. I now find, however, that both are absent from Ottawa. You might nonetheless find the above information useful.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND POWER PROJECTS; CURRENT DEVELOPMENTS

3. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, referring to discussion at a meeting of July 31st, 1951, said that, following examination of proposals for the all-Canadian St. Lawrence seaway by the ad hoc Cabinet committee established for the purpose, he and the Minister of Transport had spoken with the Chairman of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission and had suggested that the Province of Ontario assume all costs involved in the power aspect of the development, including maintenance of 14 foot navigation and dredging required up-stream from the dams. Mr. Saunders had indicated that the Ontario government would accept such a proposal in view of the shortage of power and because, even with this suggested division of costs, it would still be possible to produce a considerable quantity of relatively cheap power.

4. The Prime Minister mentioned that he had had verbal agreement from Mr. Frost to the proposal put to Mr. Saunders by Mr. Howe and Mr. Chevrier.

5. Mr. Howe suggested that the next step might be to ascertain whether the Province of Quebec would be prepared to consider developing power concurrently with the seaway in the Lachine area. It might be desirable to ask Mr. R.A.C. Henry to discuss this matter with Mr. Potvin, the President of the Quebec Hydro-Electric Commission.

6. Mr. St-Laurent felt that it would be desirable for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to speak first to the Premier of Quebec outlining to him the tenor of the discussions which have taken place with Mr. Saunders and suggesting that the Lachine development might be taken up in a preliminary way as suggested.

7. The Cabinet, after discussion:

(a) noted the report by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the discussions he and the Minister of Transport had had with the Chairman of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission; and,

(b) agreed that the Minister of Trade and Commerce approach the Premier of Quebec with respect to the concurrent development of power and the seaway in the Lachine Rapids area and suggest that the matter might be discussed in a preliminary way by Mr. R.A.C. Henry on behalf of the federal government and the President of the Quebec Hydro-Electric Commission.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], September 20, 1951

LEGAL ASPECTS OF THE ST. LAWRENCE POWER NAVIGATION PROJECT

I understand that you would like to know the international legal and constitutional problems involved in the construction of an all-Canadian navigation project and a joint Ontario-New York power development.

2. The legal position might be summarized as follows:

(a) The Canadian Constitutional Position:

(i) Navigation—I understand that the Ontario authorities have approved the terms of a Canada-Ontario Agreement. The wording of this Agreement is designed to overcome any constitutional dispute or difficulty that might arise by providing that the federal and provincial governments will each do whatever is necessary within their respective jurisdictions to advance the project. Article IV of the Agreement reads:

> "Canada and Ontario will enact such legislation as may be agreed upon between them as being necessary to authorize and provide fully for the construction, maintenance and operation of the works."

Article V, sub-section (1), reads,

"Subject to paragraph (2) of this Article, Canada will transfer to Ontario the administration of such lands belonging to Canada as are required for the works and such lands will belong to Ontario."

Sub-section (3) of the same Article reads in part,

"Ontario will transfer to Canada the administration of the works, such sites thereof and such lands belonging to Ontario as are required for the operation thereof, and such works, sites and lands shall thereupon belong to Canada."

Sub-section (4) reads,

"Ontario will indemnify and save Canada harmless in respect of all claims of third parties in any way arising out of the construction, maintenance or operation of the works."

The Department of Justice now considers that a similar Agreement with Quebec is not necessary and that no constitutional problem vis-à-vis Quebec and Canada arises.

(ii) Power Development—This will require an application by The Power Authority of the State of New York and the Ontario Hydro Commission, which will be referred by both federal governments to the International Joint Commission. The Commission's approval for the power project is necessary under the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. The draft Canada-Ontario Agreement provides that the Federal Government "will do all in its power, consistently with its obligations under the Boundary Waters Treaty aforementioned and the preservation of the interests of others in the St. Lawrence River, to obtain the approval of the International Joint Commission pursuant to an application to be made by Ontario in a form approved by Canada, etc." On the other hand, "Ontario will, in conjunction with the Government of the State of New York, construct, maintain and operate the works in accordance with the terms of this Agreement, etc." Federal legislation will be necessary to empower the Ontario Hydro Commission to construct and operate the project. I understand that the Department of Justice has drafted the necessary Bill.

(b) The Position in International Law:

(i) Navigation—No problem in international law arises. There is a very small portion of the work to be done on the United States side of the boundary, such as the deepening of a channel. This will not affect the level or flow of the water on the United States side but Canada will have to obtain the consent of the United States to do any work on the United States side. If the President agrees in principle to the new plan of development, and considering the fact that Canada at one time gave permission to the United States to deepen the channel on the Canadian side of the boundary in the Detroit River, this permission should not be difficult to obtain.

(ii) Power Development—Again there is no problem in international law. The problems that might otherwise exist are overcome in the procedure laid down in the Boundary Waters Treaty. The application of the Power Authority of the State of New York and the Ontario Hydro Commission must be submitted to the International Joint Commission by each federal government. The approval of the International Joint Commission is necessary and its order of approval is binding upon both governments, thereby eliminating the necessity for United States Senate or Congressional approval. It is expected that the Commission will take about one year to deal with the application.

(c) The United States Constitutional Position:

Before the application of the Power Authority of the State of New York is transmitted to the Commission, it is necessary for that authority to obtain a licence from the United States Federal Power Commission. No difficulty is expected in this regard, particularly if the President favours the new project. He might also have to approve the application before it is transmitted by the State Department to the Commission.

The only legal question on which there is some doubt is whether the Power Authority of the State of New York has the constitutional right to construct and operate its portion of the joint power development without approval or legislation by Congress. This is a matter of United States constitutional law on which I do not feel competent, without careful and long study of United States constitutional cases, to give an opinion. I have suggested to Mr. N.A. Robertson that we should get a quicker and more authoritative answer to this if our Embassy in Washington was asked to make informal enquiries. The specific questions put to Mr. Wrong are contained in the copy of the telegram attached,† which I despatched this morning.

ST. LAWRENCE DEVELOPMENT PROJECT; PROGRESS REPORT

13. The Minister of Transport, referring to discussion at the meeting of August 22, 1951, reported briefly on progress which had been made in discussions with Ontario and Quebec Hydro representatives on the St. Lawrence power and seaway project.

The Premier of Ontario and the Chairman of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission had agreed to a proposal respecting the International Rapids Section, under which the Province of Ontario and the State of New York would assume complete financial responsibility, on an equal basis, for all costs involved in developing power and maintaining 14 foot navigation and also in providing river bed channeling required for deep-sea navigation. A draft agreement between the governments of Canada and of Ontario to give effect to this proposal had been prepared and could be signed at any time. Copies of the draft agreement were circulated.

(Draft agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Ontario respecting the development of power in the International Rapids Section of the St. Lawrence River)†

The only reservation the Province of Ontario had in respect of this draft agreement was the provision respecting the control dam near Iroquois Point. Provincial representatives, however, fully appreciated the reasons for this provision from the federal point of view but wished to be afforded an opportunity at a later date to submit their views. Provision for making such representations had been included in the draft agreement.

During conversations between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Premier of Quebec, Mr. Duplessis had expressed interest in the proposed joint development of power and seaway in the Lachine Rapids area and agreed that the Quebec Hydro-Electric Power Commission should discuss the problem in a preliminary way with federal representatives. As a result, the matter had been taken up with Mr. Potvin, Chairman of the Commission, by Mr. R.A.C. Henry, on behalf of the federal government. It soon became clear, however, that a decision could not be reached in the immediate future by Quebec representatives, since no serious consideration had been given to the development of added power at Lachine for some years past. Furthermore, it should be borne in mind that the shortage of power was not nearly as acute in Quebec as it was in Ontario, and for this reason, it was anticipated that it might not be possible to conclude an agreement with Quebec on quite as favourable a basis, from the federal point of view, as was the case in respect of the proposed development in the International Rapids Section. If it were not for the proposed joint seaway-power development project, the Province of Quebec would, in all probability, not wish to develop added power at Lachine immediately, and in any event would prefer to develop the full power potential at Lachine in two stages rather than in one. On the other hand, Mr. Henry had expressed the opinion that the ultimate cost to the federal government would be approximately the same whether the seaway was developed alone in the Lachine area or whether both power and the seaway were developed concurrently. In the circumstances, the federal government might be less reluctant to proceed with an independent seaway project in the Lachine area in the event the Province of Quebec did not see fit to develop power concurrently.

14. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that, during the recent N.A.T.O. meetings at Ottawa,[99] Mr. Acheson had stated informally that Mr. Truman now held the view that, since Congress had not seen fit to consider favourably the joint St. Lawrence seaway and power project, he would be prepared now to do everything in his power to facilitate the development of an all-Canadian seaway if Canada were prepared to proceed alone. Mr. Acheson added that, if Congress were presented with the evidence that Canada had made all necessary arrangements to proceed with an all-Canadian seaway, they might wish to reconsider and approve some form of joint undertaking.

15. The Prime Minister felt that, if Congress did approve, at a later stage, of a joint undertaking, it would be preferable to proceed on that basis since the cost of the seaway would not be as great if developed on the U.S. side. On the other hand, it should be made clear that Canada was ready to proceed alone and that a joint undertaking would only be considered favourably here if Congressional approval had been obtained prior to work on the Canadian seaway being actually started.

As had been suggested at an earlier meeting, it seemed desirable, if all the necessary approvals were obtained in respect of the power and seaway development, to establish some suitable St. Lawrence seaway authority which would arrange for the financing of the federal share of the undertaking through the issue of debentures with government guarantees and would also undertake the administration of the toll system. Although it had been suggested that all, or at least some portion of the costs involved in widening and deepening the channel below Montreal and in enlarging and improving harbour facilities along the seaway, might be taken into account in fixing the toll rates on the seaway, it would seem better, on the whole, to take into account only those expenditures in the area in which the tolls would actually be collected, i.e., the St. Lawrence River between Montreal and foot of the lakes. In this connection, it should be borne in mind that it was anticipated that the United States would assume financial responsibility for the works required in the upper lakes and for this reason, it would seem preferable not to load the toll structure with costs incurred below Montreal. In so far as the application of the toll system was concerned, it would seem reasonable that the toll should apply equally to all shipping using the waterway without discrimination.

16. Mr. St-Laurent thought that it would be useful if he saw Mr. Truman personally and gave him a detailed report as to the progress made to date and sought his active support in obtaining whatever authorizations were required to permit the State of New York to carry out its share of the power development programme in the International Rapids Section.

17. The Cabinet, after further discussion:

(a) noted with approval the report by the Minister of Transport on progress which had been made in recent discussions with Ontario and Quebec representatives on the proposed joint power and waterway development in the International Rapids Section of the St. Lawrence River and the Lachine Canal area; and,

(b) agreed that the Prime Minister arrange to see President Truman in Washington, in the near future, for the purpose of outlining to him steps which have already been taken with a view to the development of an all-Canadian seaway in the St. Lawrence and of seeking the President's active support in obtaining whatever authorizations were required to enable the State of New York to carry out its share of the power development project in the International Rapids Section.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAYS

Confirming what I said orally at the Cabinet meeting yesterday, the question of the St. Lawrence Waterways was brought up at a luncheon meeting with Dean Acheson and Stanley Woodward on Thursday. The Secretary of State has told me (and I believe that this has already been indicated to you by Woodward) that the President has now decided to take no further initiative with Congress in respect to the St. Lawrence Waterway Development. He would not, however, stand in the way of any Canadian development and would give whatever approval was necessary. This, as you know, is necessary under the Boundary Waters Treaty. Acheson said that there were only two qualifications the President would make to such approval. One, that we would not go ahead with a power development alone. Two, that no discrimination would be exercised against United States ships using the Canadian seaway.

The Secretary of State went on to express his own personal opinion that once Congress realized that the Canadian Government was going to proceed with this work on its own, their views would change and they would be anxious to facilitate United States participation. This, however, we agreed, was a problem for the future and in the meantime, as Acheson put it "Congress could be allowed to stew in its own juice" insofar as the St. Lawrence is concerned.

ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT

The Canadian Desk at the State Department has today informed us verbally of the conclusions of the Legal Division on the questions raised in paragraph 2 of your EX-1827 of September 20th.†

(1) In the opinion of the Legal Division the New York State Power Authority has not the constitutional right to enter into an arrangement with Ontario to carry out the project until it has secured the approval of the International Joint Commission and the Federal Power Commission. For any such arrangement to be binding and enforceable in the United States courts the approval of Congress would also be necessary.

(2) There is no particular form which would have to be used for such an arrangement but presumably it would be in the form of an ordinary contract. In addition to the approvals required, as mentioned in answer to question 1, it would need the specific approval of the President.

(3) The Power Authority of the State of New York would only have the right to construct and operate its portion of the project after obtaining the approval of the International Joint Commission and the Federal Power Commission.

(4) Congressional approval would be given by resolution of both houses.

(5) Before the State Department transmitted an application of the Power Authority of the State of New York to the International Joint Commission, presidential approval would be required as well as a licence from the Federal Power Commission.

2. The Canadian Desk advise us that while the questions contained in your EX-1827 were extremely complicated the Legal Division considered that the answers now given are firm. They point out however that your message only refers to the possibility of meeting this problem by having Ontario and the New York State Power Authority enter into an effective and binding arrangement. They say that in their opinion there are other possible methods by which the problem could be solved and the feasibility of these methods is now being considered by the Legal Division of State Department. The only example of other methods mentioned was the possibility of solving the problem by an executive agreement. This however raises both political and constitutional problems and State Department is not yet ready to express any opinion as to whether this or any other line of approach is feasible.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAYS DEVELOPMENT; PRESENT POSITION

28. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of September 21st, 1951, reported briefly on conversations he had had with President Truman at the White House in Washington on September 28th on the St. Lawrence power and seaway project. He had informed the President of the very urgent need for power in Ontario and that, since there were no alternative hydro resources in that province,

Ontario might have to establish steam plants if hydraulic power were not developed in the International Section of the St. Lawrence in the reasonably near future. If steam plants were established in Ontario, the province might not be in a position to undertake subsequent hydraulic developments in the St. Lawrence for some considerable time to come. The President had further been informed that a federal-provincial agreement had been worked out between Ottawa and Toronto and that this agreement could be signed at any time. Under the agreement, the province would assume half of all the costs which would be incurred in developing power in the International Section if the seaway were not to be built. Ontario's share of the costs would thus include the cost of maintenance of 14 foot navigation and in addition of certain channelling in the river-bed required for deepsea navigation. The Province of Quebec did not need additional power to the same degree as Ontario but, in any event, the cost of building the seaway in the Lachine Canal area would not be much greater even if power were not developed concurrently, thus making it unnecessary to obtain Quebec's agreement before undertaking the overall plan. Mr. Truman had further been informed that, although Canada would prefer the joint undertaking envisaged by the 1941 agreement, mainly because it was more practical and less costly, the government had decided to proceed with the seaway alone if U.S. co-operation could not be obtained in the immediate future. It should be borne in mind, however, that a prerequisite to any seaway, either joint or all-Canadian, would be power development in the International Section. It was hoped, therefore, that, if the 1941 agreement could not be carried out and Canada proceeded with the seaway alone, the President would do everything in his power to ensure that an appropriate U.S. authority would be enabled to carry out a share of the power project. In the meantime, it was thought that the Canada-Ontario agreement should be concluded and that Ontario take immediate steps to find a suitable partner in the United States for the power phase of the development.

The President stated that he had been an ardent supporter of the St. Lawrence project ever since he became a Senator in 1945 [sic]. He would greatly prefer a joint development of the seaway, but if this proved to be impossible he would support the all-Canadian project as the most desirable alternative. He added that the threat of unilateral action by Canada might bring about agreement on the joint seaway.

At the conclusion of the talks a joint statement by the President and the Prime Minister was issued from the White House.

(Report on conversations between the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States, September 28, 1951, and attached press release)[100]

29. Mr. St-Laurent added that, on his return to Ottawa, he had informed Mr. Saunders, the Chairman of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission of his conversations with Mr. Truman. He had gathered the impression that the U.S. administration was still somewhat vague as to the constitutional position and had not yet reached the conclusion that the State of New York should be given authority to develop power in the International Section of the St. Lawrence. However, Mr. Truman appeared to be genuinely aware of the urgency of the problem and would do everything in his power to ensure that some satisfactory solution were reached soon.

30. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that Mr. Saunders had thought it might be useful for him to go to Washington immediately to try and get agreement on the power aspect of the problem. He was advised against undertaking such negotiations at this time.

U.S. Representative Blatnik had introduced a new resolution respecting the St. Lawrence project in the House Public Works Committee. It was anticipated that the Committee might vote on this resolution that afternoon and, because of certain changes in the Committee's membership, there was a possibility that the vote might be favourable. However, even if the U.S. House Public Works Committee supported the Blatnik resolution, there did not appear to be much chance of Congress taking action until its next session.

(Telegrams, Canadian Ambassador to the United States, WA 3561 and 3562, October 1, 1951)†

31. Mr. St-Laurent said that if the U.S. House Public Works Committee supported the Blatnik resolution and further action by Congress was delayed for any considerable length of time, this might prove more embarrassing to the Canadian Government than purely negative action on the part of U.S. authorities.

In any event, it was suggested that in the Speech from the Throne for the opening of the special session of Parliament it be stated that Parliament would be asked to enact legislation to provide for an appropriate agency of the federal government to deal with construction of the St. Lawrence seaway either as an international undertaking or as a purely Canadian development, such development to begin as soon as satisfactory international arrangements could be made for the power phase of the project. The introduction of legislation of this character at the special session would be a clear indication that the government firmly intended to proceed in the immediate future with the St. Lawrence waterways development.

32. The Cabinet, after further discussion:

(a) noted with approval the reports by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs on recent developments with respect to the St. Lawrence waterways development project; and,

(b) agreed that it be announced in the Speech from the Throne that legislation would be introduced during the special session to provide for the establishment of an appropriate federal agency to deal with the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway either as an international undertaking or as an all-Canadian project.

ST. LAWRENCE DEVELOPMENT PROJECT; ESTABLISHMENT OF FEDERAL AGENCY; CLARIFICATION OF LEGAL POSITION IN THE UNITED STATES

32. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of October 3rd, 1951, suggested it would be desirable to introduce in Parliament, as soon as possible, the legislation announced in the Speech from the Throne to provide for establishment of an appropriate federal agency to deal with the St. Lawrence seaway, either on an international or purely Canadian basis. This matter might be considered and reported upon at an early meeting by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Transport.

33. The Secretary of State for External Affairs quoted from a memorandum prepared for President Truman by the legal division of the U.S. State Department, prior to the Prime Minister's recent visit to the White House.[101] This set forth the legal basis upon which the Province of Ontario and the State of New York could proceed with the power development and Canada with the seaway development. It pointed out that, under the 1909 Boundary Waters Treaty, the International Joint Commission had authority to approve "uses, obstructions and diversions" on the St. Lawrence River affecting the natural level or flow of boundary waters with the authority of the United States or Canada within their respective jurisdictions. However, approval by the two governments and the International Joint Commission did not constitute an international agreement, it merely authorized the respective projects for the approval of which application had been made. Since under the 1909 Treaty the United States had the right to use on terms of equality the canal which Canada contemplated building on the Canadian side of the boundary and since under the same Treaty Canada was entitled to equal rights in the use of the boundary waters for power purposes, it would be within U.S. executive power to enter into an agreement with Canada in respect of both the seaway and power aspects of the project. In the view of the U.S. State Department, however, the executive could give no assurance that power would continue to be developed in the manner indicated by the project. Article I, section 10, of the U.S. Constitution provided that "no State shall, without the consent of Congress, ... enter into any agreement or contract with another State or with a foreign power". Consequently, in the view of the U.S. State Department, if the approval of Congress was not to be sought in connection with the St. Lawrence project, Canada would have to be content with proceeding merely on the good faith of a New York corporation and with the assurance as to equality now contained in the 1909 Treaty, possibly supported by executive agreement.

(Telegram, Oct. 6, 1951, Canadian Ambassador in Washington and attached memorandum)†

34. The Minister of Trade and Commerce did not see the necessity of a formal agreement between the State of New York and Ontario or between their respective power agencies.

35. Mr. Pearson thought that serious consideration should be given to the possibility, in the absence of any such formal agreement, that some legal process might be resorted to in the United States to hold up indefinitely development of the power and seaway project.

36. Mr. St-Laurent said that, in any event, it would be useful to introduce as soon as possible the legislation required for the establishment of the federal agency to deal with the seaway aspect of the problem.

37. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion:

(a) noted the report by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the constitutional position of the United States in respect of the St. Lawrence development project; and,

(b) agreed that the Minister of Transport consult with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and submit at an early meeting legislative proposals for the establishment of a federal agency to deal with the St. Lawrence seaway project on an international basis or as an all Canadian project.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY; LEGISLATION; ANNOUNCEMENT

9. The Minister of Transport said that further consideration had been given to legislation to be introduced in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway development. One possibility was to have a single piece of legislation at the present time to establish the agency to handle the St. Lawrence project. The other was to introduce two bills, one establishing the agency and the other authorizing the conclusion of an agreement with Ontario. On the whole it appeared best to have two bills.

10. The Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out that, in view of the adjournment of Congress without action on the St. Lawrence agreement, it was clear that there could be no implementation of the international plan at an early date. It would be desirable, accordingly, to have an approach made to the U.S. authorities asking for co-operation in having the development carried out by Canada as had been contemplated in the discussion between the Prime Minister and the President. If this was agreed, something might be included in the general statement to be made in the House of Commons on international affairs. The statement could outline the steps necessary in Canada and the United States to enable the seaway project to be undertaken by Canada alone.

A draft[102] of possible remarks was read.

11. The Cabinet, after discussion:

(a) noted with approval the report of the Minister of Transport and agreed that legislation to enable the execution of the St. Lawrence project be prepared along the lines indicated; the composition of the interdepartmental committee considering the legislation to include such persons as might be deemed desirable by him and the Minister of Trade and Commerce; and,

(b) agreed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs inform the House of Commons that an approach was being made immediately to the U.S. authorities to seek co-operation in the implementation of the St. Lawrence seaway development as a Canadian project.

Note de la Direction des Amériques et de l'Extrême-Orient

Memorandum by American and Far Eastern Division

SECRET [Ottawa], October 25, 1951

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY LEGISLATION

Mr. Don Bliss of the United States Embassy telephoned this morning to say that a meeting had been held in the White House yesterday, October 24, to discuss the procedure to be followed in the United States in cooperating with us in having the St. Lawrence project carried out by Canada, as had been contemplated in the discussions between the Prime Minister and the President. Bliss prefaced his remarks by saying that officials in Washington had been "very pleased" with the Minister's statement in the House on Tuesday, and particularly with his references to the legal position in the United States. Bliss intimated that this indicated that they were prepared, in Washington, to proceed on the basis of Mr. Pearson's statement that an early beginning on the joint project could not now be achieved and that the United States would cooperate with us in having the seaway built by Canada alone.

2. As a result of the meeting, Mr. Charles Murphy, with the concurrence of legal advisers from other departments concerned, has now told the State Department that he is sure that arrangements can be made for participation by United States agencies in the power development without any reference to Congress. What procedure is to be followed, was not divulged. However, our cooperation has been requested, on a confidential basis, in two respects:

[102] Non retrouvé./Not located.

(1) It would be of assistance in avoiding injunction proceedings in the United States if the proposed Canadian legislations could avoid the use of the word "agreement" with respect to the United States or to New York, or to any agency of either one of them.

(2) It is particularly important to avoid any reference in our legislation to the State of New York or to any agency thereof. It would also be preferable to avoid any specific reference to federal agencies as it is not yet clear whether state or federal agencies will be involved. The White House has suggested the use of the vaguest possible terms when reference is made to the participation of the United States, such as "appropriate agencies in (not "of") the United States".

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY AND POWER PROJECT

31. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the discussion at the meeting of October 22nd, 1951, proposed that arrangements be made either for the committee drafting legislation on the St. Lawrence project, or officials of the Departments of External Affairs and Transport, to recommend how the U.S. Administration should be approached with a view to obtaining its co-operation in having the project carried out by Canada. He thought that steps should be taken to associate the Chairman of the Commission with current interdepartmental discussions regarding the waterway.

32. The Prime Minister felt that, while General McNaughton would not wish to have any official connection with the interdepartmental bodies concerned, it would be well to have him kept fully informed of developments and Canadian views.

33. Mr. Chevrier pointed out that there was a question on the order paper in the name of Mr. Balcom as to the estimated costs, revenues and effects of the waterway which it appeared undesirable to answer at this time.

34. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the comments of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Transport and agreed that:

(a) the committee preparing legislation on the St. Lawrence project or officials of the Departments of External Affairs and Transport prepare recommendations as to how the U.S. Administration should be approached to obtain its co-operation in having the project carried out by Canada;

(b) steps be taken to keep General McNaughton fully informed of developments and Canadian views in connection with the project, other than as a member of interdepartmental bodies concerned; it being noted that the Minister of Transport, and the Prime Minister at a later date, would discuss the project with General McNaughton;

(c) the Department of Transport prepare a draft answer to the question on the St. Lawrence project standing on the order paper in the name of Mr. Balcom, with a view to consideration being given at a subsequent meeting to the desirability or otherwise of answering the question at this time.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY DEVELOPMENT; FEDERAL AGENCY; CANADA-ONTARIO AGREEMENT; DRAFT BILLS

1. The Minister of Transport, referring to discussion at the meeting of October 25th, 1951, reported that the special interdepartmental committee, under the chairmanship of the Deputy Minister of Justice, had prepared two draft bills, the first to provide for establishment of a St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and the second for a Canada-Ontario agreement respecting power development in the International Rapids Section.

The measure for the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority had been patterned along the lines of the Overseas Telecommunications Corporation legislation. It provided for the appointment of a President, a Vice-President and five Directors but it might be considered advisable, however, to reduce the number of Directors from five to three. It also empowered the Authority to establish a tariff of tolls which would be subject to the approval of the Board of Transport Commissioners. In essence, the Board were being given the same powers as those they enjoyed in respect of railway tariffs. The measures further provided that decisions of the Board in these matters could be appealed to the Exchequer Court. He had been informed that no such appeal procedure was provided for in the administration of the Suez and Panama Canals.

The bill respecting the Canada-Ontario power agreement incorporated the main provisions of the draft agreement prepared by federal and provincial representatives in consultation. It might be preferable, instead, merely to have a short measure seeking Parliamentary approval of the agreement, the text of which could be appended to the legislation as a schedule.

2. The Prime Minister thought that it would be inadvisable to have any federal legislation which would appear to order directly any province to do certain things.

He suggested that details of the proposed legislation be examined further by the Ministers of Transport, Trade and Commerce and Justice before submission to Cabinet for consideration.

3. The Cabinet, after discussion:

(a) noted the report by the Minister of Transport on the preparation of legislation for the St. Lawrence seaway and power project; and,

(b) agreed that details of the legislation be reviewed further by the Ministers of Transport, Trade and Commerce and Justice prior to submission of the measures to Cabinet.

ST. LAWRENCE DEVELOPMENT; DRAFT LEGISLATION

21. The Minister of Transport, referring to discussion at the meeting of November 6th, 1951, submitted two draft measures relating to the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. The first provided for the establishment of a St. Lawrence Seaway Authority for the purpose of constructing and operating deep-sea shipping channels and canals, the second related to the agreement on power development in the International Rapids Section between the federal government and the government of Ontario.

The draft measures had been circulated.

(Draft St. Lawrence Seaway Authority bill — Cab. Doc. 291-51; draft International Rapids Power Development bill, Cab. Doc. 292-51)†

22. The Minister of Trade and Commerce agreed with the Minister of Transport that the membership of the Authority should consist of a President and two Directors or Chairman and two members. At the present time, the bill provided for the appointment of a President, a Vice-President and an Assistant Vice-President.

23. The Minister of Finance said that his officials were preparing redrafts of sections 12 and 13 of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority bill relating to borrowing power. The new sections would be available for consideration at an early date.

24. The Prime Minister noted that under section 13 of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority bill it was provided that the Authority would be indebted to His Majesty for the whole or any part of the cost of the works which had been entrusted by the Governor in Council to the Authority for operation. It would seem undesirable that any indebtedness in respect of existing works should be charged against the maximum amount of $300 million which the Authority would be authorized to borrow.

25. Mr. Howe held the view that it would be undesirable to make any attempt to amortize the cost of existing works, such as the Welland and Sault Ste.-Marie Canals, through the proposed toll structure. He thought that these tolls should be based only on capital and maintenance charges incurred in respect of new works such as the International Rapids and Lachine canals.

26. Mr. Abbott suggested that a decision need not be reached at this time as to the exact basis on which the tolls should be fixed. The legislation might be drafted in general terms in order that a decision might be reached at a later date as to whether tolls should be restricted to new works or should include existing works as well. This result might be achieved by deleting the first four lines of section 15 and the words "have been constructed and" at the beginning of section 16.

He added that the tolls established by the Authority should probably be made subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

He also questioned the desirability of making the appointment of members of the Authority "during pleasure" as presently provided by section 5 of the draft bill.

27. Mr. St-Laurent thought that, in so far as tenure of office was concerned, the same sort of provision might advantageously be made in respect of the Authority as had been included in proposed amendments to the Railway Act. This would entail an initial appointment of ten years "during good behaviour" and subsequent re-appointment for any period not exceeding ten years.

28. Mr. Chevrier suggested that a new paragraph be inserted immediately following paragraph (a) of section 10 to ensure beyond doubt that the Authority would have the power to proceed with an all-Canadian seaway or to develop the seaway in conjunction with the United States depending on developments.

He also felt that a new section 6, terminating the 1941 agreement with Ontario, should be added to the International Rapids Power Development bill.

29. Mr. St-Laurent felt that, before proceeding any further, it might be useful to discuss the draft legislation with the U.S. State Department in order to make certain that the Canadian measures would not in any way jeopardize the Canada-U.S. agreement whether the seaway was proceeded with as an all-Canadian project or as a joint undertaking. For this purpose, it was proposed that a representative of the Department of Justice should proceed to Washington in the near future.

He further suggested that resolutions in respect of this legislation should be submitted for consideration at the next Cabinet meeting in order that they might be placed on the order paper of the House of Commons as soon as possible.

30. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that:

(a) the draft legislation on the St. Lawrence seaway and power project be revised in the light of the suggestions made during the discussion and be submitted for consideration at a subsequent meeting;

(b) details of the proposed legislation be now discussed by representatives of the Department of Justice and officials of the U.S. State Department in order to ensure that the Canadian measures would not in any way jeopardize entry into the required Canada-U.S. agreement; and,

(c) resolutions to precede introduction of the legislation be submitted for consideration at the next meeting.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY; DRAFT LEGISLATION; RESOLUTION

5. The Minister of Trade and Commerce referring to discussion at the meeting of November 12th, 1951, submitted a revised draft of legislation on the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority which he and the Minister of Transport had discussed with members of the special interdepartmental committee. He outlined briefly certain changes which it was thought could usefully be made. In fixing tolls, it had been felt that the legislation should provide that the tariff of tolls, when established by the Authority, should be filed with the Board of Transport Commissioners and that the Board be empowered to review such tolls if any representations were made in respect of discrimination in rates and to make whatever recommendations it saw fit to the Authority.

A redraft measure was circulated.

(Draft bill, Nov. 14, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 299-51)†

6. The Prime Minister suggested, in order to remove any doubt that a member of the Authority could be reappointed more than once, that section 5(2) of the draft bill might be reworded somewhat as follows:

"A member, on the expiration of a first or subsequent term of office, may be reappointed for a further term not exceeding ten years."

7. Mr. St-Laurent also reported that the Deputy Minister of Justice would proceed to Washington in the next few days for the purpose of discussing with U.S. State Department officials and others the proposed Canadian legislation. The U.S. administration was now apparently satisfied that the St. Lawrence project could be undertaken without Congressional approval and that the United States would probably rely on the 1909 Boundary Waters Treaty rather than on federal Power Commission legislation.

8. The Cabinet, after further discussion:

(a) approved in general principle the draft St. Lawrence Seaway Authority bill, subject to certain revisions as suggested by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce;

(b) noted that the details of the legislation would be discussed in Washington shortly by the Deputy Minister of Justice and appropriate U.S. officials; and,

(c) approved for introduction a resolution respecting the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority legislation.

801. PCO/Vol. 207

Procès-verbal de la réunion du Comité du Cabinet sur le projet d'aménagement du Saint-Laurent

Minutes of Meeting of Cabinet Committee on St. Lawrence Development Project

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], November 24, 1951

Present:
The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier)(in the Chair)
The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe)
The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson)

Also Present:
The Deputy Minister of Justice (Mr. Varcoe)
The Secretary to the Cabinet (Mr. Robertson)
The Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Reid)
Mr. G.E. Cox, Department of External Affairs
Mr. Guy A. Lindsay, Department of Transport
Mr. Paul Pelletier, Privy Council Office

1. The Deputy Minister of Justice reported that he had just returned from Washington where he had discussed with representatives of the State Department, the Department of Justice and the Federal Power Commission, certain legal and constitutional problems arising out of the proposed St. Lawrence seaway and power project. U.S. officials had made it clear that under the terms of the U.S. Constitution, it was not possible for a State to enter into any contract or agreement with any foreign state or power without approval having first been obtained from Congress. In view of this constitutional limitation and the apparent reluctance of Congress to approve the development, great care would have to be taken that no agreement or contract were entered into directly by the State of New York and the Province of Ontario. On the other hand, the State of New York had obtained legal advice to the effect that New York State or its Power Commission could legally enter into a contract with the Province of Ontario for the development of power in the International Rapids section. This view, however, did not seem to be shared in Washington. The Federal Power Commission was of the opinion that, in view of the powers Congress had delegated to the Commission in matters relating to power development, the Commission could license the State of New York to contract with Ontario for the development of power in the St. Lawrence without it being necessary for such contract to be submitted to Congress for approval. He had been unable to ascertain to what extent this opinion was shared in Washington but he felt that the State Department and the Department of Justice would rather favour some form of action under the 1909 Boundary Waters Treaty without relying on the federal power legislation. These discussions had served the purpose of indicating that points of view in the United States still diverged considerably in respect of the difficult legal and constitutional problem involved.

He had, however, gathered the strong impression that the U.S. administration would welcome early action by the Canadian Parliament on the proposed enabling legislation respecting the St. Lawrence seaway and power project.

Before the Canada-Ontario draft agreement respecting power could be signed, certain drafting changes would have to be made to take into account the constitutional impediment placed on the State of New York insofar as the entry into a contract or agreement with Ontario was concerned. It was suggested, for example, that the third paragraph of the preamble to the agreement might be reworded along the following lines:

> "Whereas Ontario is desirous of undertaking such development concurrently with the undertaking of a complementary development by a duly constituted authority in the United States of America."

Changes of a similar character would have to be made in Articles II, III, VI and XI.

The Government was apparently anxious to introduce the required legislation without any further delay. It might, therefore, be advisable to ask the Premier of Ontario, Mr. Saunders and Mr. Magone to come to Ottawa within the next few days to reach agreement on and sign the revised agreement on power.

2. The Secretary to the Cabinet felt that in view of the importance of the power agreement, it might perhaps be useful to give Messrs. Saunders and Magone an opportunity to consider fully the revised text before Mr. Frost were asked to come to Ottawa for signature.

3. Mr. Chevrier said that he would wish to have the Canada-Ontario agreement actually signed before introducing either the seaway or the power legislation in the House of Commons. In the circumstances, the Secretary to the Cabinet might get in touch immediately with Mr. Saunders and Mr. Magone and ask them if they could come to Ottawa the following Monday. Presumably agreement on the revised text could be reached without too much difficulty and Mr. Frost should then be asked to proceed immediately to Ottawa for signature.

4. Mr. Varcoe said that although the U.S. administration would appreciate Canada proceeding with its enabling legislation before adjournment of the current session of Parliament, it was also hoped that nothing would be done by Canada or Ontario, at least until March 1st, 1952, which would have the effect of preventing the United States participating in the development of the seaway. Apparently Washington was still hopeful that Congressional approval might be obtained for the 1941 agreement prior to that date.

5. The Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out that, even if no time were lost after approval was given to the legislation by Parliament, there did not appear to be any possibility that actual work on either the seaway or the power development could start for some considerable time. In the circumstances, Canada and Ontario should probably get on with the job subject to accepting U.S. participation if Congress acted in sufficient time to make this possible.

6. Mr. Lindsay pointed out that the Canadian application to the International Joint Commission on behalf of Ontario could not be submitted unless agreement had been reached with the United States that they would submit concurrently an application in identical terms on behalf of the State of New York or some other appropriate U.S. or State authority.

7. Mr. Robertson said that the Canadian Government departments concerned should proceed immediately with the preparation of the submission to the IJC since it would presumably take some months before the submission was actually ready.

8. The Committee, after further discussion,

(a) agreed that the Deputy Minister of Justice revise the draft Canada-Ontario agreement on power along the lines suggested;

(b) agreed that the Secretary to the Cabinet arrange for Mr. Saunders and Mr. Magone to come to Ottawa the following Monday to consider the revised text of the agreement and that as soon as the revised text was accepted by both parties concerned the Premier of Ontario be asked to come to Ottawa for signature;

(c) agreed that the bills respecting the St. Lawrence seaway and the power development in the International Rapids section, with certain minor modifications, be submitted to Cabinet the following Tuesday;

(d) noted that the U.S. administration was still hopeful of obtaining Congressional approval for the 1941 agreement before March 1st, 1952; and

(e) agreed that preparation of the required Canadian submission to the International Joint Commission in this matter be undertaken immediately by the departments concerned.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND POWER PROJECT

10. The Minister of Transport said the Premier of Ontario had indicated that he could be in Ottawa on November 28th or November 30th, 1951 to sign the agreement with the federal government on the St. Lawrence power project. While not pressing the point, Mr. Frost had suggested that consideration be given to including a clause in the agreement to the effect that, should the United States decide to participate in the development of the Seaway, Ontario should be relieved of some of its financial commitments under the agreement. It was understood that Mr. Frost contemplated a clause similar to that in the 1941 agreement, whereby Canada had undertaken to pay half of the cost of the common works. He had suggested that his proposal be discussed with Mr. Saunders who had now arrived in Ottawa.

11. The Minister of Trade and Commerce thought it would be reasonable to include a clause in general terms to the effect that the financial provisions would be reviewed should the United States decide to participate as a full partner in the Seaway project.

12. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the report of the Minister of Transport and agreed that:

(a) there was no objection to including in the proposed agreement with Ontario on the St. Lawrence power project a clause in general terms to the effect that the financial provisions would be reviewed should the United States decide to participate as a full partner in the development of the Seaway;

(b) when introduced in the House of Commons, the proposed legislation on the St. Lawrence Seaway and power projects should not be referred to a committee.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND POWER PROJECT; PROGRESS REPORT

9. The Minister of Transport, referring to discussion at the meeting of November 26th, 1951, said the Chairman of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario had, the previous day, discussed with members of the special Interdepartmental Committee on the St. Lawrence Seaway the revised text of the draft agreement with Ontario on power development in the International Rapids section. This revision had been made necessary because of the constitutional limitation on the State of New York in the matter of a possible agreement or contract with Ontario.

Mr. Saunders had expressed himself as generally satisfied with the revision but wished to submit the new text to his legal advisers in Toronto before final approval was given on behalf of the Province of Ontario. He further suggested that clause 6 of the draft bill respecting the St. Lawrence power development be deleted. This clause, which purported to terminate the 1941 Canada-Ontario agreement, was unnecessary since the 1941 agreement had never actually come into force. In any event, if some form of termination were felt to be desirable, it would seem preferable to include a clause to this effect in the new agreement itself rather than in federal legislation approving the new agreement on behalf of Canada.

10. The Secretary to the Cabinet referred to the earlier suggestion by the Premier of Ontario that an additional clause be inserted in the new agreement to provide that, in the event Congress approved the 1941 Canada-United States Agreement on the St. Lawrence, the presently proposed allocation of costs between Canada and Ontario be reviewed. In discussion the previous day, however, Mr. Saunders indicated that it now seemed preferable to omit any such reference in the new draft agreement since this might tend to create the impression in the United States that Canada did not seriously contemplate proceeding with the Seaway on an all-Canadian basis. In the circumstances, Ontario would be prepared to rely on a verbal commitment by federal authorities that the whole problem of cost allocation would be reviewed and if necessary readjusted in the event the 1941 Canada-United States agreement gained Congressional approval.

11. Mr. Chevrier added that, if final agreement on the revised text could be reached by federal and provincial officials that day, Mr. Frost might come to Ottawa the following day for signature.

12. The Cabinet, after further discussion:

(a) noted the report by the Minister of Transport on current developments respecting the St. Lawrence Seaway and power project; and,

(b) approved for introduction the resolution to the bill entitled "The International Rapids Power Development Act".

ST. LAWRENCE POWER PROJECT; CANADA-ONTARIO AGREEMENT; ANNOUNCEMENT

7. The Minister of Transport, referring to discussion at the meeting of November 27th, 1951, reported that, during the course of a telephone conversation with the Premier of Ontario the previous day, Mr. Frost had raised certain objections to some of the provisions in the proposed new Canada-Ontario agreement on power development in the St. Lawrence. He was particularly concerned about Article XII which stipulated that Ontario would reimburse the federal government in the amount of $14,335,000 in respect of maintenance of 14 foot navigation which should be rendered unnecessary in view of the construction of the Seaway by the federal government. He also thought the agreement would place Ontario under an excessive liability for claims which would undoubtedly arise as a result of increased erosion along the north short of Lake Ontario (Article V(4) of the draft agreement).

Mr. Frost felt the practical result of the proposed allocation of costs would be that power produced from the new International Rapids plant would cost approximately five mills per kilowatt-hour as opposed to six mills for steam-produced power. It would be recalled that some time ago the Chairman of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission had stated that, under the terms of the 1941 agreement, power could be produced at a cost to the consumer of two mills per kilowatt-hour and that under the proposed new agreement the cost would probably be not more than three mills, whereas it was estimated that steam-produced power would cost approximately seven mills per kilowatt.

Mr. Frost had indicated he would come to Ottawa that day for the purposes of discussing these various points with the Prime Minister and himself. Notwithstanding the objections raised, it was thought the Premier would probably be prepared to sign the draft agreement in its present or slightly modified form.

8. The Prime Minister said that the agreement, as presently drafted, did not provide for termination of the 1941 agreement with Ontario. It was proposed, however, that when the new agreement was signed he should give the Premier of Ontario a letter which would serve as a notice of cancellation of the 1941 agreement and stress that the new agreement had been concluded in the expectation that the United States would not participate in the project, but that, in the event such participation were obtained, the government of Canada would be prepared to reconsider the terms of the new agreement with a view to making such modifications of those terms as might be appropriate in recognition of the arrangements that would then exist between Canada and the United States in respect of the St. Lawrence project.

9. Mr. St-Laurent also said that it was proposed to table the agreement in the House of Commons that afternoon if signature could take place before then. He submitted and read a draft statement which he proposed to make at the time of tabling.

10. The Cabinet, after discussion:

(a) noted the report by the Minister of Transport on points raised by the Premier of Ontario in respect of the proposed new Canada-Ontario power agreement;

(b) approved the letter proposed to be given to Mr. Frost by the Prime Minister at the time of signature of the agreement; and,

(c) agreed that, in the event signature took place before then, copies of the agreement be tabled in the House of Commons that afternoon and a statement be made at that time along the lines suggested by the Prime Minister.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER PROJECT; MODIFICATION OF AGREEMENT WITH ONTARIO

3. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of November 29th, 1951, said that he and the Minister of Transport had discussed with the Premier of Ontario, the previous day, certain of the provisions contained in the proposed new St. Lawrence power agreement with Ontario. Mr. Frost was accompanied by Mr. Porter, Mr. Challies and Mr. Saunders.

Mr. Frost had been rather anxious that the federal government commit itself to implementing the terms of the 1941 agreement in the event U.S. participation in the development of the Seaway was obtained in the reasonably near future. It had been pointed out to Mr. Frost that a firm commitment of this character was not possible in view of the substantially changed conditions and since it was not known whether the United States would be prepared to accept all the provisions of the 1941 agreement even if they did obtain Congressional approval for participation in the development of the Seaway. Mr. Frost was assured, however, that in the event U.S. co-operation was obtained the federal government would agree to review the terms of the proposed new Canada-Ontario power agreement to take into account the new arrangements which would then exist between Canada and the United States.

Mr. Frost had further expressed some concern about the extent of the Province's liability under Paragraph (4) of Article V, which stipulated that Ontario would indemnify and save Canada harmless in respect of all claims by third parties in any way arising out of the construction, maintenance or operation of the power works. He said it was not at all impossible that certain riparian owners on the north shore of Lake Ontario would claim compensation for damages arising out of erosion, which the owners would likely attribute to the new power works, although engineering studies had clearly indicated that no such damage could be caused by the power development above a point in the vicinity of Spencer Island. He therefore suggested, and it was agreed, that Article V(4) be amended to provide that no damages attributable to the power development could arise west of a line drawn due north and south from the most westerly point of Spencer Island in the St. Lawrence River, near Prescott.

Premier Frost had also voiced some apprehension about the effect Article XII might have on the State of New York and the electorate of Ontario. This Article provided that, in the event the construction of the Seaway by Canada rendered the maintenance of 14 foot navigation unnecessary in the International Rapids Section, the Province would pay to Canada the sum of $14,335,000. After some considerable discussion it was agreed that no mention be made of a fixed amount in this connection and that Article XII be redrafted to provide simply that, in the event of the construction of the Seaway by Canada, Ontario would pay to Canada a part of the cost of such locks and works equivalent to the cost of the works that would have been required to be constructed by Ontario to permit the continuance of 14 foot navigation.

4. Mr. St-Laurent pointed out that the new agreement was subject to confirmation by both Parliament and the Legislature of Ontario. The provincial House would not meet until February 1952 and Premier Frost had suggested that Parliament might withhold its approval of the agreement until the next regular federal session in 1952. Thus it would be possible to modify further the agreement, if this appeared to be desirable, after discussing the matter fully with the State of New York and before the agreement was actually approved by Parliament and by the Legislature of Ontario. It was pointed out to Mr. Frost in this connection that there was probably some considerable advantage to be gained in obtaining Parliament's approval for the agreement immediately. This would further help to convince the United States that Canada fully intended to proceed alone with the Seaway development if U.S. participation could not be obtained. However, it was agreed that the Canadian Ambassador at Washington be consulted as to his views on the most desirable course of action in this connection.

5. Mr. St-Laurent said the agreement would be signed by himself, the Minister of Transport, the Premier of Ontario and Mr. Challies at 2.00 p.m. the following Monday. At that time Mr. Frost would be given a letter which would serve as notice of cancellation of the 1941 agreement with Ontario and which would make clear that the present agreement had been concluded on the understanding that the United States would not participate in the development of the Seaway but that, in the event such participation were obtained, the government of Canada committed itself to review the terms of the new Canada-Ontario agreement in order to take due cognizance of the new relationship which would then exist between Canada and the United States in respect of the development of the Seaway.

It was suggested that the resolutions respecting the Seaway and the power development might be taken up in the House of Commons the following Tuesday. If the resolutions were adopted that same day, the bills might be given second reading the following Wednesday or Thursday.

6. The Cabinet, after discussion:

(a) noted the report by the Prime Minister on his discussions with the Premier of Ontario regarding certain provisions of the proposed new Canada-Ontario agreement on power development in the International Rapids Section of the St. Lawrence;

(b) approved the changes made in Articles V and XII of the agreement as a result of these discussions; and,

(c) noted that the agreement would be signed the following Monday at 2.00 p.m. and approved the tabling in the House of Commons the same day of copies of the agreement.[103]

DESPATCH X-3512 Ottawa, December 7, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

A new agreement between the Governments of Canada and the Province of Ontario with respect to the development of power resources in the St. Lawrence River was signed in Ottawa on December 3, 1951. The agreement forms the schedule of a bill respecting this development and approving the present agreement. Three copies of this bill, including the schedule, are enclosed.†

[103] Voir Canada, Statuts du Canada, 1951, 2ième session, chapitre 13, pp. 169-179.

2. The new agreement supersedes the agreement between Canada and Ontario, dated March 19, 1941, which has now been cancelled, in accordance with Article XV of that agreement, by a letter to Premier Frost of Ontario, dated December 3, 1951. The present agreement has been concluded in the expectation that the United States will not participate in the navigation phase of the project, and its terms have been agreed to on the understanding that the navigation works will be an all-Canadian undertaking. While it is the intention of the Government of Canada to proceed as rapidly as possible with this project, it is understood that the United States Administration intends to make a final effort to obtain Congressional approval, early in the 2nd Session of the 82nd Congress, of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Agreement of 1941. In the event that Congress approves this agreement before arrangements committing the Governments of Canada and Ontario to the implementation of the project, as at present envisaged, are finally completed, the Government of Ontario has been assured that the Government of Canada will be prepared to reconsider the terms of the agreement of December 3, with a view to making such modifications as would then be appropriate.

3. In this connection it would be useful to have your views on the prospects of obtaining the approval of Congress at its next session. It is our understanding that the only resolution at present before the Committee on Public Works of the House of Representatives is H.J.Res.337 of October 1, in the name of Mr. Blatnik, while the resolution referred to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is S.J.Res.27. A review of the present membership of the Committee on Public Works with any information you may be able to obtain on the views of the newer members of the Committee and on prospective changes in the membership of the Committee would be useful.

4. It has been assumed on the basis of your advice from time to time on this point that there is little chance that Congress will approve the 1941 Agreement at the next session. However, some proponents appear to believe that Congress will eventually approve the agreement and that the prospect of an all-Canadian seaway will encourage some members of Congress to support the joint project, for various reasons, rather than permit Canada to build the seaway alone. On the other hand, whatever support the joint undertaking may derive from this source may be counter-balanced by the loss of support of those who favour the project but who would welcome any way of avoiding open support of it. Moreover, the 2nd Session of the 82nd Congress will be necessarily short because of the national conventions of the political parties next summer, and Congress may wish to engage more in activities which will be more fruitful at election time.

5. The agreement between Canada and Ontario is subject to approval both by Parliament and by the legislature of Ontario, which will not meet until some time next February. Premier Frost had suggested that Parliament might withhold its approval until its next regular session in 1952, so that it would be easier to make whatever modifications, if any, might appear to be desirable after discussing the matter fully with the agency undertaking the work in the United States. It was pointed out that there would be a considerable advantage to be gained in obtaining Parliament's approval for the agreement immediately as this would further help to convince the United States that Canada intended to proceed alone with the development. However, it would be appreciated if we could have your views as soon as possible in this connection.

6. Another bill authorizing the establishment of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, a corporation to construct, maintain and operate the seaway either as a wholly Canadian undertaking or in conjunction with works undertaken by an appropriate authority in the United States, has also been introduced in Parliament. Three copies of this bill† are enclosed, together with three copies of Mr. Chevrier's opening statement† on the resolution introducing it.

7. Meanwhile, the ad hoc Cabinet Committee on the St. Lawrence Project has asked that preparation of the required Canadian reference to the International Joint Commission be undertaken by the Departments concerned. In this connection, it is understood that an inter-agency committee of United States officials has been proposed to work out procedure and to deal with Canadian and Ontario officials in connection with the New York-Ontario power development and the all-Canadian waterway. As the Canadian reference to the I.J.C. will have to be related to a concurrent and complementary reference by the United States, the manner and timing of an approach to the State Department, requesting the co-operation of the United States in preparing the references to the I.J.C., is under consideration. Your views in this connection would also be appreciated.

8. The preparation of the references to the I.J.C. should in no way prejudice the chances of obtaining approval of the 1941 Agreement by the United States Congress, and may, indeed, add a fillip to support for the joint undertaking by those members of Congress who would be unwilling to countenance an all-Canadian seaway. It is our wish to refer the complementary applications of Ontario and New York to the Commission as soon as possible. On the other hand, we are prepared to defer deciding upon an agreed date when the reference is to be made until the prospect of approval of the 1941 Agreement early in the 2nd Session of the 82nd Congress can be more accurately assessed. In any case, it is unlikely that the references could be ready for submission to the Commission much before the first week in March.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

1. In paragraph 5, of your despatch under reference, you refer to Premier Frost's suggestion that Parliament withhold approval of the St. Lawrence legislation until the next session and ask for our comments as soon as possible.

2. All supporters of the St. Lawrence project here, both those in the administration and those outside, have repeatedly stressed the desirability of early passage of this legislation. If after the extensive debate that has already taken place final passage is postponed, supporters of the project would be greatly disturbed and might begin to have doubts of the sincerity of the Canadian intention to proceed with the seaway alone. The administration at present appears to be ready to proceed with planning the steps that must be taken immediately if a decision is reached that the 1941 agreement will not obtain approval by Congress. If the Canadian legislation is not passed at this session of Parliament the administration's sense of urgency in going ahead with this preliminary work might disappear.

3. If passage should be delayed the opponents would undoubtedly be given assistance in preventing consideration of the 1941 agreement when Congress opens in early January.

4. We will reply to the other questions asked in your despatch under reference as soon as we have had time to give them further consideration.

DESPATCH 3570 Washington, December 14, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

1. It is not yet possible to give any firm opinion of the prospects of the 1941 Agreement being approved at the coming session of Congress. There is no doubt that the administration will press hard for the approval of the agreement since the President and the different government departments in Washington would all prefer to have the seaway developed as a joint project. However, since the members of the Senate and the House have almost all been away from Washington since it became evident that, in the event of the Agreement not being approved, Canada would proceed with the seaway alone, it has not been possible to determine the effect that this has had on Congressional opinion. This point was checked with the State Department yesterday and they advise us that their Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations does not expect to have any definite opinion on this point until Congress has been in session for two or three weeks. They point out that some proponents of the seaway may be quite ready to see the seaway constructed by Canada which would achieve their purpose without requiring a vote in its favour that might displease at least some of their constituents. On the other hand others may be reluctant to abandon the right of the United States to have a say in the establishment of a rate of tolls. For this reason the changed situation may have an influence in opposite directions on different members of Congress and until they can be canvassed it is impossible to assess the net effect.

2. The special interests opposed to the seaway will undoubtedly continue their opposition. The delay that would result from abandoning the 1941 Agreement, the possibilities of further delay in the hearings before the I.J.C. and the F.P.C., and the possibility of court actions would be to their advantage.

3. The position in the Public Works Committee of the House continues to be very close. Since the adverse vote of 15 to 12 in July there has only been one change in the committee when Mr. Steed replaced Mr. Pickett. Steed was expected to be in favour of the seaway but has told a number of people that he had commitments not to vote in its favour until January next. Proponents are hopeful that he will vote in favour in future but this, of course, remains to be seen. The only further change at present contemplated in the committee is the replacement of Representative Quinn. This change has been suggested for a long time but the administration are still hopeful that it will take place before a further vote is taken in the Public Works

Committee and it is expected that he will be replaced by a supporter of the project. Therefore, assuming that the other members of the committee do not change their position it is expected that a future vote would be 14 to 13 in favour.

4. In the Senate the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee is against the project but has said that hearings will be held. The administration is satisfied that if the project can be brought to a vote in the Senate Committee a majority will be favourable to the scheme. Recent inquiries concerning the progress of the Canadian legislation by a staff member of the Senate Committee gives some indication that that committee is renewing its interest in the project.

5. The United States Interdepartmental Committee to consider the steps to be taken to proceed with the Canadian seaway has not yet been established. Earlier this week, as a result of a report of discussions held in Ottawa that have [sic] been received at the State Department, a further approach to the White House was made and State Department are hopeful that the Interdepartmental Committee will be established within the next two weeks. White House has decided that Mr. deLuccia should not be Chairman of this committee because of his support of private as opposed to public power development. The man now being considered is Mr. Croll, a lawyer who has been associated with federal power development schemes, who is well known to some of the State Department lawyers and who, in their opinion, would be an active and aggressive chairman.

6. We believe that it would be well not to make a formal approach asking the United States for cooperation in drafting a recommendation to the I.J.C., for the next ten days or two weeks as they would not be in a position to arrange talks until the Interdepartmental Committee was established. At that time we might suggest that talks begin early in the new year.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Following from Under-Secretary, Begins: There are a number of complex and time-consuming steps to be taken before the St. Lawrence power project and the all-Canadian seaway can be started. The initiative of the United States Government in establishing an inter-Agency Committee to deal with these matters is welcomed.

2. The steps to be taken in obtaining approval of the plan at present envisaged must be more thoroughly understood and action to obtain this approval must be undertaken as soon as practicable if the urgent requirements for both power and navigation are to be met.

3. It is desirable that discussions be arranged on a continuing basis, beginning early in January, in order to prepare references to the International Joint Commission and to initiate any other steps that may be necessary. Following is the text of a draft Note from you to the State Department:

Text begins:

The Canadian Ambassador presents his compliments to the Secretary of State and has the honour to refer to the discussion of the St. Lawrence Seaway and power project between the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States which took place in Washington on September 28, 1951.

(2) At that time, the President and the Prime Minister agreed on the vital importance to the security and the economies of both countries of proceeding as rapidly as possible with both the seaway and the power phases of the project. The Prime Minister indicated that the Canadian Government would be willing to construct the seaway as a solely Canadian project if it is not possible to have the joint development undertaken on the basis of the 1941 Agreement. The President agreed to support this Canadian action if an early commencement on the joint development did not prove possible.

(3) The Canadian Parliament has recently passed legislation providing, on the one hand, for a power development on the St. Lawrence River, to be undertaken by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario and an appropriate agency in the United States and, on the other hand, for the establishment of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority to construct the seaway either in co-operation with the United States, as envisaged in the 1941 Agreement, or as a solely Canadian undertaking. This legislation may now be brought into force at any time by proclamation.

(4) The Canadian Government is prepared to proceed with the construction of the seaway as soon as appropriate arrangements can be made. Failing approval of the 1941 Agreement by the Congress it will be necessary to refer the project to the International Joint Commission for approval. In order to proceed as rapidly as possible with the project, which the President and the Prime Minister have agreed is of vital importance, the co-operation of the United States Government in preparing concurrent references of the power project to the International Joint Commission is requested.

(5) Such a preparatory step would in no way prejudice the possibility of proceeding with the project on the basis of the 1941 Agreement in the event that Congress should approve that agreement. On the other hand, it is desirable to seek the approval of the International Joint Commission as soon as practicable in order to avoid any further delay in the event that Congress does not approve the 1941 Agreement early in the next session.

(6) It is proposed that appropriate officials of our two Governments, together with officials of other interested agencies, discuss the steps to be taken in proceeding with a reference of applications to the International Joint Commission for the construction of the power project. A series of meetings beginning early in January, either in Washington or in Ottawa, would be most appropriate for this purpose. Text ends.

4. I should be most grateful for your opinion on the wisdom of submitting a Note along these lines to the State Department as soon as possible and for your suggestions for revision of the note. It might be useful if you were to show the State Department the Note in draft form. The Note has already been discussed with an officer of the United States Embassy here and Dale of the Canadian Desk has made suggestions which have been incorporated in it. The United States Embassy here reports that in Dale's view it would be useful if the Note could be delivered between Christmas and New Year's; this confirms the view expressed in paragraph 6 of your despatch No. 3570 of December 14. ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

With reference to the last paragraph of my teletype under reference, when the draft note was discussed with an officer of the United States Embassy here, the following items were mentioned in connection with steps yet to be taken. These may be of value to you in discussing the note with the State Department:

(a) An entirely new application for reference to the I.J.C. by the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission to take into account the features of the plan at present envisaged, which were not included in the 1948 application.

(b) A complementary or parallel application by the Power Authority of the State of New York or whatever other agency is to undertake the work in the United States.

(c) The possible need for a memorandum of agreement or some other instrument, such as an exchange of notes between the two federal governments, in respect to these applications.

(d) Our wish to have the applications referred to the I.J.C. not later than the end of March, and even before that date should it become clear that Congressional approval of the joint project would not be forthcoming. (Neither the preparation or submission to the I.J.C. nor action upon it by the I.J.C. would prejudice the possibility of Congressional approval of the joint project. Moreover, procedural steps in the I.J.C. necessitated the lapse of as much as 60 days before hearings could actually commence.)

(e) We expressed the hope that the proceedings before the F.P.C. could follow or be held simultaneously with the hearing by the I.J.C. In this connection, we understand there were complications because the 1948 application of the New York State Power Authority, had been referred by the F.P.C. to Congress in December, 1950. We would be interested in knowing what was contemplated in Washington with respect to licensing of the power project.

1. State Department have now passed on to us the following comments from the White House on the draft note contained in your EX-2404 of December 20.

2. To permit the President to change his position concerning the power development the White House considers it will be necessary for the references to the International Joint Commission and the Federal Power Commission to make some reference to the construction of the seaway. They suggest therefore that in the last sentence of paragraph 4 and in the first sentence of paragraph 6 of the draft note the word "power" be omitted. If this word is not deleted the United States reply would have to comment on this point.

3. The White House does not know in what capacity or at what time during the discussions New York State officials may be brought in. They would therefore like to see the reference to "officials of other interested agencies" in paragraph 6, deleted and suggest we refer to "officials of our two countries".

4. The White House considers that the proposed exchange of notes will constitute the memorandum referred to in paragraph (c) of your EX-2414 of December 20. This being the case it would appear to be appropriate to change the note from the third person to the first person.

5. Will you please advise us immediately whether the suggested changes are acceptable.

1. We have now received the State Department draft of the reply which they propose to send to our note, the text of which was contained in your EX-2404 of December 20th. The State Department draft is based on the assumption that we will incorporate in the Canadian note the amendments suggested in WA-4297 of December 26th. The United States draft has been cleared with officials of the White House but has not been shown to the President personally.

2. The text of the United States draft is as follows:

Text Begins:

"Excellency:

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your note of _____, concerning the St. Lawrence seaway and power project.

My government notes with gratification that the Canadian Parliament has passed legislation providing, on the one hand, for the construction of the power phase of the project to be undertaken by the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario and an appropriate agency in the United States; and on the other hand, for the establishment of the St. Lawrence seaway authority to construct the seaway, either in cooperation with the United States as envisaged in the 1941 agreement, or as a solely Canadian undertaking.

As you know, the President hopes that the Congress of the United States will approve, at an early date, the 1941 agreement providing for joint construction of the St. Lawrence project. Should the Congress, however, not approve the 1941 agreement at an early date, the Government of the United States is prepared, in order to avoid further delay in the construction of the St. Lawrence project, to cooperate with the Government of Canada in referring the project to the International Joint Commission for approval on the understanding as expressed in your note, that your government is prepared to proceed with the construction of the seaway as soon as appropriate arrangements can be made.

In order that there may be a minimum of delay in the construction of the project, which the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada have agreed is of vital importance to the security and the economies of both countries, my government is ready to cooperate with your government in undertaking such preparatory steps as may be advisable in presenting concurrent references to the International Joint Commission. On behalf of my government, I accept your proposal that appropriate officials of our two countries discuss the steps to be taken in proceeding with such references. I agree that a series of meetings to be held either in Washington or in Ottawa, or at such other place as may be convenient, would be the most appropriate method for implementing this proposal. Although it may not be possible for my government to be fully prepared to undertake these discussions early in January, I expect that it will be prepared to do so at some time during that month. I shall inform you as soon as my government is ready to join in the discussions which you have proposed.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest considerations. Ends.

1. Cabinet has approved the Note to the State Department contained in our EX-2404 of December 20, with the amendments suggested by the White House as set forth in your WA-4297 of December 26.

2. I agree that it would be appropriate to change the Note from the third person to the first person.

3. We have no suggestions to make for the amendment of the United States draft reply as set forth in your WA-4317 of December 28. In order, however, to make it unnecessary for the United States, in its reply, to state that it cannot begin the discussions with us "early in January", and in view of the fact that the Note itself is being presented early in January, you might amend the last sentence of our Note to refer to "a series of meetings beginning the middle of this month". This would require consequential revision in the second to last sentence of the United States reply.

4. When you have reached agreement with the State Department on the precise terms of the exchange of Notes, please exchange the Notes and let us have the text. I should also be grateful if you would let us know when you think the White House would wish to publish the exchange of Notes.[104]

1. This memorandum deals with the urgent problem of the import controls on cheddar cheese and processed milk announced recently by the United States Department of Agriculture. This action followed from a rider known as the Andresen amendment which was attached to the Defence Production Act. Exports of certain of our dairy products, and particularly of cheddar cheese, are likely to be restricted as a direct result. Even more important is the fact that these restrictions are wholly inconsistent with the principles and the agreements upon which joint trade has been developed in recent years between Canada and the United States. If the latter is to persist in the application of these new measures, there may be harmful and unavoidable consequences for the commercial policy which has been pursued by both countries in recent years.

2. In introducing its new import controls, the United States Congress has for the first time taken action in contravention of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. The GATT provides clearly that quantitative import restrictions of this kind shall not be imposed except in certain stated circumstances which cannot be held to exist in respect of these commodities at the present time. By this legislation, furthermore, the United States has impaired and, indeed, nullified the value of tariff concessions negotiated at Geneva in 1947 and at Torquay, these concessions having been bound until January 1st, 1954. Canada has negotiated and paid for reductions in the United States duty on cheddar cheese which have reduced that duty from a level of 4 cents per pound, but not less than 25% ad valorem in 1947 to 3 cents per pound, but not less than 15% ad valorem at present. The new import controls will make it impossible for Canadian exporters to take advantage of these tariff reductions and, indeed, their position will be worse than it was prior to the Geneva negotiations.

3. Members of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce of the House of Commons questioned the Torquay Delegation on the likelihood of the United States taking action to nullify or impair tariff concessions which had been negotiated. In his evidence before the Committee, Mr. H.B. McKinnon, the head of the Delegation, said it was "unthinkable" that the United States would violate her agreement with Canada. The Standing Committee also inquired into the steps open to Canada should the United States or any other country violate the GATT. Mr. McKinnon went on to point out, in response, that if the United States were to violate her agreement in respect of even one important commodity, measures of retaliation could be devised. Parliamentary action would not necessarily be required, he said, since tariff concessions could be withdrawn from the United States in most instances by the mere cancellation of an order-in-council. The relevant passages are in the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee for May 29 and June 11.[105]

4. Cheddar cheese is the only type sold in large quantity by Canada to the United States. United States imports of cheddar have been as follows during the three year period:

Year	Canada	New Zealand	Other	Total (pounds)
1948	10,110	—	1,190	11,300
1949	1,795,131	1,136,301	204,869	3,136,301
1950	2,770,541	10,376,254	146,447	13,293,242
		Average of three years		5,480,281

Annual import quotas will be equal to the average of three years, 1948-50. United States imports of cheddar cheese, which have grown steadily to a level of 13.3 million pounds will thus be cut back to a rate of 5.5 million pounds per year. Since the new import quotas are not allocated to individual countries, it is impossible to say how much of the cut will be borne by Canadian cheese. As a result of the United Kingdom contracts placed in Ontario, there may not be as much Canadian cheese available for export to the United States this year. Producers of mature cheddar, such as Black Diamond, may feel the adverse effects immediately and these will be unavoidable for other producers as time goes on.

5. It cannot be argued plausibly that cheese is in a particularly difficult position in the United States at the present time. During 1950 the United States Government accumulated an inventory of over 100 million pounds of cheese but this surplus has largely disappeared by now. Although the support price for first grade cheddar cheese has been raised to 36 cents per pound (from 31 cents in 1950), the current wholesale price of about 40 cents per pound is high enough so that none is being offered to the Government. There is thus no new surplus being built up. In any event, imports of all cheese into the United States amount to less than 5% of domestic production and imports of cheddar cheese are approximately 2% of domestic production. It is difficult, therefore, to believe that imports present much of a threat to United States cheese producers. In other words it is impossible to condone, or to justify under the GATT, the import controls which have been introduced.

6. The Defence Production Act was signed by the President of the United States on July 31. Although the Andresen amendment is in contradiction to the commercial policy of the Administration, the President approved the amendment along with the rest of the Bill, presumably as part of a compromise by which he obtained passage of his emergency legislation. It is obvious that Wisconsin dairy interests are the principal supporters of the Andresen amendment.

7. The Andresen amendment was studied carefully in Ottawa as it moved through its early legislative stages. Officials have been concerned that if this principle of unwarranted import controls is once established, there will be nothing to prevent its being extended arbitrarily to many products. On July 13 the Ambassador to the United States was asked to make a protest to the State Department against the general principle involved in the proposed measure. A copy of the message† to Washington of that date is attached to this memorandum. Other countries which have expressed their interest to the United States in this matter include France, Denmark, Australia, Argentina, the Netherlands, Finland, New Zealand, Switzerland, Norway, Uruguay, and the Dominican Republic.

8. It seems desirable now to send a Note to the United States Government to protest again, and in stronger terms. A draft Note is attached to this memorandum, which is, in effect, a request that these new import controls be withdrawn. There is little reason, however, to hope that the Administration will be able to have the Andresen amendment withdrawn at an early date. The Administration is, in fact, in a weak position, the amendment having been attached to a piece of emergency legislation which is both controversial and important. Before any action is taken, the Government should therefore decide how far it is prepared to go should remedial steps not be taken by the United States. If the Government is to undertake measures of retaliation against the United States, the appropriate form of retaliation would probably be the withdrawal of selected tariff concessions which were negotiated with the United States either at Geneva or at Torquay. It would be desirable to choose tariff items for this purpose which would have a penal effect upon United States trade but would have as little effect as possible upon the cost of living in Canada. If effective measures of retaliation are announced by the Government, these may be of great assistance to the President of the United States in dealing with Congress. The Administration will be in a stronger position to ward off the demands of pressure groups if it can be shown that restrictive trade measures of this kind will provoke a prompt reaction from Canada and other countries.

9. The timing of any retaliatory measures is important. Consideration must be given to the position of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade which will convene in Geneva on September 17. If the Government is to decide in favour of retaliatory measures, it would be desirable to make a public announcement, on or before September 17, that certain specified tariff concessions will be withdrawn from the United States immediately following the close of the current session of Congress, unless the new import controls have been removed in the meantime. The Contracting Parties could then be notified of this announcement. This would put the Government in the position of having taken action well in advance of the fall session of Parliament. Opinion in the United States might well be more concerned about getting into difficulty with Canada than it would be about an infringement of the GATT and this is a reason in favour of our taking any action directly and announcing it later to the Contracting Parties. Since the obligations of the United States in this matter are laid down in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, however, it is inadvisable to ignore the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement. This is why it is desirable that any announcement by the Government be made in advance of September 17 so that the Contracting Parties may be notified. It is quite possible that some other Government may take the initiative in placing this item on the agenda of the coming meeting of the Contracting Parties and in that case the Canadian Delegation can support it without difficulty. For Canada to consult the Contracting Parties to the GATT in advance, however, about any retaliatory measures, would inevitably be to delay any action until after Parliament meets. A long debate in the Contracting Parties, furthermore, would have an unpredictable effect on United States opinion.

10. In view of the above, I recommend,

(a) that a Note be delivered to the Government of the United States as in the draft attached to this memorandum;

(b) that the Minister of External Affairs, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce should consult jointly to determine whether retaliatory measures are required in the light of the reply to be received from the Government of the United States; and

(c) that the Minister of Finance be requested to review tariff concessions which have been made in the past, to select items which may be withdrawn if necessary from the United States and following the consultation made in (b) to make an appropriate recommendation.[106]

C.D. HOWE

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Projet de note pour le Gouvernement des États-Unis

Draft Note to the United States Government

Ottawa, August ____, 1951

The recent announcement of the United States Department of Agriculture with regard to the control of imports into the United States of fats, oils, and other dairy products has created a situation which is of urgent concern to the Canadian Government. The restriction of the imports of dried milk products, and cheese in particular, will cause immediate damage to Canadian trade with the United States.

In the case of cheese, the new import quota will reduce United States imports substantially below the levels which have prevailed in the immediate past. This reduction cannot fail to have a serious prejudicial effect upon the position of the Canadian dairy industry.

[106] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 22 août 1951./Approved by Cabinet, August 22, 1951.

While the impact of the new restrictions upon particular producers is of immediate concern, the Canadian Government wishes also to call the particular attention of the Government of the United States to the more far-reaching implications of this action. The new restrictions announced by the United States Department of Agriculture are contrary to the obligations which the two governments have assumed toward one another in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. The latter provides clearly that quantitative import restrictions of this kind shall not be imposed except in certain stated circumstances which cannot be held to exist at present in respect of these commodities. These new import controls, furthermore, will nullify the value of certain of the tariff concessions which were negotiated at Geneva in 1947 and at Torquay, these concessions having been bound by the United States until January 1, 1954.

The Government of Canada has sought at all times to observe the terms of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade which govern the commercial relations between our two countries. The Canadian Government earnestly hopes the Government of the United States will review the action it has recently taken to restrict the imports of dairy products, in the light of the provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, in order that the mutually advantageous trade which is of such great importance to the general well-being of both our countries may not be impaired.[107]

UNITED STATES IMPORT RESTRICTIONS ON CHEESE AND OTHER DAIRY PRODUCTS

1. The officials in Ottawa chiefly concerned have considered whether there should be any change in our representations to the United States on this matter in the light of:

(a) the message of the President to the Congress asking for the elimination of the Andresen Amendment (and other parts of the Act),[108] and

(b) the reaction of State Department to the protest filed by Denmark.

2. It is agreed here (a) that there should be no change in the Note presented to State Department; (b) that the oral representations should be rather stronger than they would otherwise have been; that while no specific reference should be made to the form of retaliation under consideration it should be indicated that there is a good deal of opinion in Ottawa at all levels in favour of "doing something about it" if the import restrictions are not removed; and that the question should be raised what further action Canada might take to support the stand which the Administration is now taking vis-à-vis Congress.

U.S. IMPORT RESTRICTIONS ON CHEESE

1. Willoughby heard that the U.S. Department of Agriculture had decided to put import quotas on a country-by-country basis. He understood that this arrangement was desired by the Canadian authorities but wished to confirm his point.

2. After consultation with the interested Departments we have replied along the following lines. While we were interested in knowing what form the United States import quotas would take, and while we had raised questions in this connection, we had not intended to imply that we were in favour of country-by-country quotas as opposed to any other form of quota. Our basic position was that we regretted that any quotas had been imposed and hoped that they would be taken off as soon as possible. We had no comment to offer on the particular form of quotas which the United States was now proposing.

3. For your own information we have looked into the question of country-by-country quotas and find that, from the Canadian point of view, it would be possible to argue either for or against. Since we had no very special interest in the form of the quotas we were able to take the high line indicated in the foregoing paragraph.

Following for Isbister from Deutsch, Begins: Reference United States import restrictions on dairy products.

1. While in Washington last week I had some discussion with United States officials regarding the steps that are being taken to remove the restrictions on the importation of dairy products. As you know, a Bill is now being introduced in the Senate and hearings are to be held. They told me that they do not expect any serious opposition to the passage of this Bill in the Senate but they are still uncertain as to whether this can be done during the present session of Congress. There will, of course, also have to be a Bill in the House, and even though they could get it through the Senate, it is felt that the shortage of time may even be a greater obstacle in the House. Consequently we may be up against the difficulty that while the spirit is willing, the time-table and procedural difficulties in the Congress may make action impossible at this session.

2. My own feeling is that we should not take retaliatory steps at this time, but allow a few weeks to pass in order to see how things go. We should reconsider the position again in about two weeks time. I am a little afraid that if we take too precipitate action in the light of the efforts being made by the Administration and the considerable favourable response received in political quarters, that we may muddy the waters. Meantime I think it is well, however, to keep the possibility of retaliation alive in the minds of the Americans so that after a reasonable time has passed, action can be taken, if necessary, without having to counter the charge that no warning has been given. Meanwhile we would, I am sure, be interested to learn the feelings of other Delegations on this matter at Geneva.

3. These views are being canvassed with the other Departments concerned and we will advise you immediately of any change.

DESPATCH 408 Geneva, September 27, 1951

Reference: Our telegram No. 91 of September 26, 1951.†

RESTRICTION ON IMPORTS OF DAIRY PRODUCTS INTO THE UNITED STATES

The Contracting Parties discussed this item at their meeting on September 24. In addition to the countries principally affected by the Andresen amendment, a number of other delegations took a serious view of this infringement of the General Agreement. Altogether the delegations of eleven Contracting Parties, apart from Canada, took part in the debate. These included the Netherlands, Denmark, Italy, New Zealand, France, Norway, Australia, Czechoslovakia, Sweden, Finland and the United Kingdom. The good faith of the United States Administration in this matter was well demonstrated by Willard Thorp who welcomed the statements made by other countries, explained how these measures came to be attached to the Defence Production Act, and expressed the hope that the legislation providing for these import controls would be repealed. He referred to the exceptional speed with which repeal measures had already been launched. In addition to their concern about the particular measures adopted by the United States, a number of speakers addressed themselves to the underlying principles, and there was a clear consensus that complete repeal must be regarded as the only satisfactory solution.

2. The Canadian statement, which was made toward the end of the discussion, was comprehensive and attempted to put the entire issue in proper perspective. This seemed all the more necessary as some of the delegates of protectionist countries, such as the Italians, the French and the Finns, were inclined to argue narrowly on the basis of statistical considerations, contending, for example, that the proportion of imports of cheese into the United States to domestic cheese production was not such as to offer competition to the United States producer which could in any sense be described as dangerous, or contending that their particular brand of cheese should be exempt as being non-competitive with United States cheese.

3. In our own statement we emphasized the fact that we were disturbed at the damage done to Canadian producers of cheese and disturbed also about the broader principles involved in this issue. We were convinced that the letter and the spirit of the General Agreement were being infringed by the Andresen amendment. The General Agreement expressly forbade quantitative restrictions of this kind. Furthermore, these quantitative import restrictions wholly impair the value of certain of the tariff concessions granted to us by the United States at Geneva and Torquay. In view of the scrupulous observance of trade treaties which had prevailed in the United States and Canada, this unilateral withdrawal on the part of the United States had prompted a good deal of unfavourable public comment in Canada. A grave view was necessarily being taken of this matter by the Canadian Government.

4. We proceeded to suggest that, quite aside from the abrogation of trade treaties which was involved, not even the most sympathetic observer would contend that United States cheese producers are experiencing undue difficulties. During the past year government surplus stocks of cheese have been substantially reduced. The market price of cheese, furthermore, has been strong, being sufficiently above the level even of the recently increased government support price, so that government stocks are not being increased.

5. We informed the Contracting Parties that the Canadian Government was at present engaged in bilateral consultations with the United States as provided for in Article XXIII. The exact text of this portion of the statement was transmitted to you in our telegram under reference. It is unnecessary to repeat in this context the proposal we made for keeping this item on the agenda, so that the Contracting Parties might revert to it later to assess the extent to which the United States Administration was achieving success in its efforts to have the import control amendment repealed.

6. Earlier in the discussion the Delegation of Norway had suggested that a Working Party be appointed to examine this question and make appropriate recommendations to the Contracting Parties under Article XXIII. In our statement we opposed this procedure. There had been complete agreement in regard to the facts of the issue (even the United States Delegation had not attempted to refute these facts) and no divergent proposals were confronting the Contracting Parties. We had in mind that a Working Party might be dragged into a detailed examination of retaliatory withdrawals on the part of those countries which might decide on such action after it became clear that the Defence Production Act amendment would not be repealed before the end of the present session of Congress. Our position on this procedural question was shared by almost all the interested delegations, and the Norwegian representative subsequently withdrew his proposal.

7. Many of the European countries argued that United States import restrictions such as those contained in the Andresen amendment undercut their efforts under the Marshall Plan to become independent of outside economic assistance and would undoubtedly compel them, as a practical measure, to revise the scale of their current and projected imports from the United States. All of them agreed that the psychological effect of the recent United States restrictions in their countries had been profound, particularly in view of the fact that the United States had long been regarded as the chief advocate of freer world trade.

8. The United States reply began with a detailed analysis of the division of function between the executive and legislative branches of their government. The United States representative, Mr. Thorp, then proceeded to outline the steps which had already been taken by the Administration with a view to securing Congressional repeal of the Andresen amendment. He asked that his government be given an opportunity to carry its efforts to a successful conclusion, although some allowance might have to be made for the slow pace at which the wheels of legislative action are apt to revolve. In any case, if the Administration failed in its efforts, the United States would anticipate entering immediately into appropriate consultations with interested governments under the provisions of Article XXIII of the General Agreement.

9. Mr. Thorp made a special point of emphasizing that the recent amendment to the Defence Production Act should not be taken to indicate a basic change in the policy of the United States Government. He explained that the Andresen amendment had arisen and been passed rather outside the normal channels for dealing with questions of this kind. Nor should the Andresen amendment be taken as a considered revision of this policy by the United States Congress. What it did indicate was the fact that in any country there is a need to be vigilant in the protection of general policy against the interests of special groups. Mr. Thorp concluded his statement by declaring that, in the view of his government, the repeal of the Andresen amendment would provide the happiest solution to the problem which had been raised in the forum of the Contracting Parties.

10. At the conclusion of the discussion the Contracting Parties agreed to take note of the United States statement and to retain this item on the agenda of the current session and, if necessary, on that of the next session, pending further legislative developments in the United States.

III. U.S. IMPORTS; RESTRICTIONS ON DAIRY PRODUCTS; MOVEMENT OF CANADIAN GRAPES

12. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said it seemed clear that no action would be taken at the present session of Congress to repeal the import restrictions on dairy products. In the circumstances the Canadian delegation at Geneva should secure permission for Canada to withdraw concessions to the United States if no change were made in the U.S. position. No commitment should be made that Canadian action would occur and the question should not be treated on the basis of retaliation. It was desirable to have permission, however, in case action should be required before the next session of G.A.T.T. At the present time Canadian products were moving to the United States under an acceleration of the 1952 quota. The policy of acceleration could conceivably be carried forward quite a distance so that no actual interference with Canadian exports would take place, at any rate not for some time. On the other hand, it might develop at a future date that the Canadian quota had been entirely used up and no further movement would be possible.

There had been some earlier suggestion that measures might be taken to prevent the movement of grapes from Canada to the United States. A proposal that we enter into quota arrangements had been rejected. No actual measures of restriction had been taken.

13. The Chairman of the Tariff Board said he thought it was important that the government be prepared to take fairly strong action if the restrictions on dairy products were not removed. The U.S. administration was opposed to the restrictive provisions and their real fear was that Canada would not take sufficiently firm action. It would also be essential for the government, for domestic reasons, to have taken a decisive position.

14. The Committee noted the report of the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce and agreed that the Canadian delegation to G.A.T.T. be instructed to raise the question of U.S. import restrictions with a view to securing permission that would enable action by Canada to be taken, if necessary, in advance of the next session of G.A.T.T.

RESTRICTED [Geneva] October 26, 1951

ITEM 30

RESOLUTION OF THE CONTRACTING PARTIES ON THE UNITED STATES IMPORT RESTRICTIONS ON DIARY PRODUCTS IMPOSED UNDER SECTION 104 OF THE UNITED STATES DEFENCE PRODUCTION ACT

PROPOSAL BY THE CHAIRMAN AFTER CONSULTATION WITH INTERESTED DELEGATIONS

The CONTRACTING PARTIES

TAKING NOTE of the statement made on September 24 by the United States representative regarding Section 104 of the United States Defence Production Act under which the United States Government has imposed restrictions on the importation into the United States of a number of dairy products;

TAKING NOTE with satisfaction of the strong determination on the part of the United States Government, as indicated in this statement, to seek repeal of Section 104 of the Defence Production Act, and of the speedy action taken looking toward such repeal;

TAKING NOTE of the further statement on October 26 by the United States representative reporting that such action had not yet resulted in such repeal;

RECOGNIZING that concessions granted by the United States Government to contracting parties under the General Agreement has been nullified or impaired within the meaning of Article XXIII of the General Agreement and that the import restrictions in question constitute an infringement of Article XI of the Agreement;

RECOGNIZING FURTHER that a large number of contracting parties have indicated that they have suffered serious damage as a result of this nullification or impairment, and that the circumstances are serious enough to justify recourse by those contracting parties to paragraph 2 of Article XXIII;

RESOLVE, without prejudice to the rights of any contracting party under paragraph 2 of Article XXIII

TO COUNSEL the contracting parties affected, in view of the continuing determination of the United States Government to seek the repeal of Section 104 of the United States Defence Production Act and the high priority and urgency which it has stated it will give to further action to this end, to afford to the United States Government a reasonable period of time, as it has requested, in order to rectify the situation through such repeal; and

TO REQUEST the United States Government to report to the CONTRACTING PARTIES at as early a date as possible, and in any case not later than the opening of the Seventh Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, on the action which it has taken.

Note de la 1ère Direction de liaison avec la Défense pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures[109]

Memorandum from Defence Liaison (1) Division to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs[109]

SECRET [Ottawa], February 10, 1951

SOME TECHNICAL AND POLITICAL COMMENTS ON NEVADA ATOMIC TESTS

It may be worth while to set on paper a few observations suggested by the recent atomic tests held near Las Vegas, Nevada. It should be emphasized that our speculation on the type of explosions that have taken place during these tests is not based on technical knowledge of atomic weapons nor on any restricted information concerning the tests. There have been so many wild statements reported, however, that it is easier to say what the explosions were not than what they were. No doubt Dr. Solandt will in due course have accurate information as to what has been taking place, and some indication of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission's evaluation of the scientific and military information obtained. This memorandum simply presents a few guesses as to some of the technical and political factors involved.

Very interesting C.S.A.R[itchie]

I. Technical Factors

1. Five explosions have been reported, the first four in two pairs and the fifth separately. Each of the pairs consisted of a relatively mild explosion first, followed within twenty-four hours by a much more powerful one. The fifth explosion appears to have been considerably more powerful than any of the others.

2. While there has been virtually no information released concerning the nature and purpose of the tests, one might speculate somewhat as follows. Earlier tests have been concerned with the atomic weapon as a bomb pure (if one may use the term) and simple. Technical developments have continually been increasing the destructive energy which such a bomb can release, and this trend has been reported periodically to the press. Perhaps the fifth and most powerful of the recent explosions was a test of the most up-to-date weapon of this type.

3. Of late, however, there has been a focusing of interest upon the possible use of atomic bombs as tactical weapons. The two obvious types would be artillery shells and guided missiles. In either case one might expect some sacrifice of power in the interest of effective design of the weapon for tactical use. Very possibly the first four of the present explosions have been tests of weapons of this sort. The milder explosion in each pair might represent primarily a test of the weapon in its non-nuclear aspects with only minimal provision of bomb components for the testing of firing mechanisms, and the subsequent more powerful explosion a fully charged test designed to permit estimation of the weapon's tactical efficiency.

4. Press comment has been concerned with the development of a "limited atomic explosion", suitable for tactical use, with the implication that there is some advantage in having available weapons which release energy in an amount between an ordinary H.E. bomb and a full scale atomic bomb. While it is possible that there might be some military advantage in having a weapon producing less than the full destruction of an atomic bomb as hitherto understood, the use of such a weapon could not, it is believed, represent any appreciable saving in nuclear fuel. A certain critical mass of nuclear fuel is, of course, required for any nuclear explosion, large or small, and for any but the most powerful atomic bombs it is likely that but little more than this minimum is sufficient. The effectiveness of an atomic bomb is in all probability determined primarily by the method whereby the nuclear energy is released and strength of the casing to contain the explosion as long as possible, and only secondarily by the amount of fuel, provided, of course, that this exceeds the aforementioned minimum.

5. In this light, it appears that utilization of scarce nuclear fuel in weapons of less effect than atomic bombs of the type previously tested would not be sufficiently economical to justify a programme for the development of such limited tactical weapons. Hence press suggestions of a "fizzle explosion" weapon would appear to be unjustified or misinformed.

6. The most likely explanation as to what kind of atomic weapon was being tested was implied in General Collins' interview last Monday, February 5, when he volunteered the information that atomic artillery shells are "wholly possible" and "in the not-too-distant future".[110] He added more cautiously that it would be "many years" before guided missiles with atomic warheads would be available, but said that guided missiles themselves would be ready for use "inside of eighteen months". It would therefore appear that the Nevada tests consisted of four tests of a "tactical bomb" followed by one test of the most powerful type of "improved bomb" developed since Bikini.

II. Political Factors

1. Both the Alsops[111] and Reston have suggested, in articles that may or may not have been "inspired", that the timing of the Nevada tests was deliberately intended to serve as a reminder to the world at large and the Russians in particular that the main strength of the United States lay at present in its atomic superiority and its superior capacity in inter-continental strategic bombing. The USSR and the People's Government of China have, during the past few months, shown a surprising readiness to take additional risks of an outright war with the United States, and the Nevada tests may be intended to draw attention to the fact that the United States in Korea has, so to speak, been fighting with its right hand tied behind its back.

2. Reston specifically links the tests with the increasing pressure being placed on Yugoslavia by the military build-up in the surrounding satellite states which has led to some apprehension that an attack on Tito might be impending. The Alsops have also mentioned the Yugoslav situation, but have written in more general terms, in an article, attached,† about "Unfreezing the Asset". If "inspired", these articles imply a United States decision to give serious consideration, at least, to using the bomb in the event of a Soviet or satellite attack on Yugoslavia. If such a decision is in fact being considered by the United States Government, it would mean almost as much for Yugoslavia as inclusion in the North Atlantic Treaty. Although relaxation of export controls on strategic materials has been discussed in the North Atlantic Council Deputies, there has been no previous hint of such a strong U.S. policy in support of Tito.

3. One further indication that the Alsop and Reston articles have been inspired is that at least one member of the U.S. Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy has as much as told the press that in private session the Committee had discussed the international effect of the Nevada tests.

4. The tests have no doubt also had a domestic political effect in bolstering U.S. confidence in their own strength, and helping to offset to some extent the Korean reverses, while building up public confidence in the progress of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission's weapons development programme.

[Toronto], March 16, 1951

Dear Mr. Johnson:

This letter is to confirm our several telephone conversations of recent date regarding proposed amendments to the purchasing policy for uranium in Canada.

In view of the increasing demand for uranium it seemed desirable that we should consider whether or not there were any additional steps which could be taken to encourage further the search for uranium, and more particularly to bring about a more intensive development of existing radioactive occurrences. In considering the problem it was decided to obtain an expression of opinion from the Advisory Mining Committee of the Atomic Energy Control Board. Accordingly a meeting of the Committee was convened on January 18th. At the meeting progress during 1950 was reviewed with special reference to the Eldorado program at Beaverlodge Lake and its probable bearing on the development of other properties in that area. The Committee's views may be summarized as follows:

(a) While it was not considered necessary at this time to increase the base price on the current schedule, it did seem imperative to offer some special incentive during the early years of production.

(b) Period of Guarantee—Because of the location and nature of Canadian deposits the maximum possible time must be allowed for bringing a property into production. Accordingly, it was recommended by the Committee that every consideration should be given to a further extension of the period of the guarantee.

(c) The Committee recommended that some publicity should be given to the results of Eldorado's exploration program with a view to offsetting a prevailing belief that it will be difficult, if not impossible, to find a second commercial deposit in Canada.

[112] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
The Minister to see: very interesting, if speculative A.D.P.H[eeney] Feb 13

(d) The Committee recommended that Eldorado should make provision for the treatment of ores, other than its own ores, which may be produced in the Beaverlodge Lake area of Northern Saskatchewan.

Eldorado, as sole purchasing agent for all uranium produced in Canada, has given serious thought to the several recommendations of the Committee. With respect to recommendations (a) and (b) it was decided after a thorough examination of all the factors involved, that a special development allowance of $1.25 per pound to be payable on the first three years' production and a two year extension of the guaranteed period would meet the situation. As regards recommendations (c) and (d), it was also decided that Eldorado would seek an early opportunity of implementing these.

As I explained to you on the telephone some weeks ago, it seemed desirable to announce any modifications of policy which might be decided upon, at the joint Annual Meeting of the Prospectors and Developers Association and the Geological Association of Canada. I had been invited to address this gathering some months ago.

In view of the commitments entered into by the United States Atomic Energy Commission with regard to the purchase of Canadian production as set out in your letter of April 7th, 1950, it seemed advisable that I should consult with you before making any announcement with respect to the granting of a special development allowance or the extension of the guaranteed period.[113] Accordingly I advised you on March 2nd, 1951 of our proposals regarding the granting of a special development allowance and the extension of the guaranteed period. Further, I advised you that we would wish to have an undertaking from the United States Atomic Energy Commission that the commitments as set out in paragraph 3 of your letter of April 7th, 1950, and which now reads as follows:

> "... the Commission is prepared to purchase from Canada all the uranium produced under this program through March 31, 1958, up to a total of 8,000 tons, and under a ceiling price for black oxide of $10.00 (U.S. Currency) per pound of U_3O_8 content. Appropriate contracts will be made from time to time."

would be amended to read as follows:

> "The Commission is prepared to purchase from Canada all the uranium produced under this program through March 31st, 1960, up to a total of 8,000 tons and under a ceiling price for black oxide of $11.25 (U.S. Currency) per pound of U_3O_8."

You advised me that these proposals were acceptable to you and that you would recommend their acceptance by the Commission.

As you are aware, my address to the Prospectors and Developers Association delivered on March 6th contained an announcement respecting the granting of a special development allowance and an extension of the guaranteed period to March 31st, 1960.

Since it was not possible to complete an exchange of formal correspondence on the subject prior to my announcement of March 6th, it was understood that this would be done at as early a date as possible. I would appreciate hearing from you in this connection.

Yours sincerely,

TOP SECRET Washington, March 19, 1951

Dear Mr. Robertson:

A problem has arisen in connection with a request made to the National Research Council recently by the United Kingdom Government for the loan of a certain amount of plutonium which the British apparently require in connection with an atomic weapon test. The National Research Council has asked the United States Atomic Energy Commission for its advice with regard to the British request in the light of the purchase agreement recently concluded between Canada and the United States for the supply of plutonium to this country. The advice to be given to the National Research Council is at the present under consideration by the United States authorities, and we have been brought into the picture by the State Department in view of the fact that the U.S. authorities are inclined to advise us to decline the British request in view of the terms of our agreement with the U.S. Government on the supply of plutonium.

The facts as I have established them from the State Department are as follows. On March 6th Mr. John Hall (Secretary of the C.D.A. and the official responsible for liaison with the State Department) addressed to Gordon Arneson of the State Department a letter informing the State Department that the United States liaison officer at Chalk River had been told that the Canadian Government had received a request from the United Kingdom Government for the loan of 5 kilograms of separated plutonium. Hall's letter went on to say that the National Research Council had indicated that they would like to have the advice of the United States Atomic Energy Commission on the question of filling this request. It was understood that it is the intention of the United Kingdom Government to replace the 5 kilograms borrowed from Canada by plutonium produced in United Kingdom reactors in 1953. There was no indication in the message received from the United States liaison officer in Chalk River about the use for which the United Kingdom authorities intended the borrowed plutonium. In the opinion of the United States Atomic Energy Commission, however, as well as of the State and Defense Departments, the amount requested clearly implies that it will be used for the purpose of an experimental detonation of an atomic weapon produced in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Arneson has pointed out to us that the purchase agreement concluded between Canada and the United States provides that all plutonium produced in the present N.R.X. reactor, as well as in the N.R.U. reactor which is to be built, is to go to the United States, with the following exceptions:

(a) the amount of plutonium required for the Canadian research programme,

(b) amounts with specifications which are not acceptable to the United States Atomic Energy Commission, and

(c) minor amounts which may be made available by Canada to the United Kingdom in connection with its research programme.

The officials of the United States Atomic Energy Commission and of the Defence Department who have considered the matter are inclined to conclude that the amount requested by the United Kingdom cannot be considered as a minor amount, nor is it prima facie intended for a research programme in the strict interpretation of that term. Therefore, having regard to a strict construction of the obligations entered into by Canada in regard to the United States in the supply of plutonium, the United States authorities are inclined to advise that the National Research Council should decline the United Kingdom request.

Mr. Arneson, on the other hand, is fully alive to the implications which a decline to the United Kingdom request might have in regard to relations not only between Canada and the United Kingdom, but also to relations between the United Kingdom and the United States. The State Department are aware, as we are, of the political importance attached by the United Kingdom Government to the development of atomic weapons in the United Kingdom pending at least the conclusion of a more satisfactory long-term arrangement between the three countries. To decline the request now pending for the loan of plutonium would seem to prejudice the prospects of the United Kingdom programme at a time when no alternative arrangements have been offered by the United States for the development of atomic weapons in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Arneson is still not in a position to suggest when the tripartite talks on a long-term arrangement may be resumed in the Combined Policy Committee. The Atomic Energy Commissioners have apparently been studying the proposals worked out in the Defense Department and expect to reach certain conclusions this week. This will open the way to consultations between the Defense and State Departments and the United States Atomic Energy Commission and to consultations with the Joint Congressional Committee. It is still impossible, however, to predict any timetable for the projected tripartite meetings.

It seems to me that it would be desirable, before the United States Atomic Energy Commission gives its reply to the query received from the National Research Council through the United States liaison officer in Chalk River about the British request, to know whether Dr. Mackenzie has told Sir John Cockcroft about the purchase agreement on plutonium concluded between Canada and the United States in sufficient detail for the United Kingdom authorities to realize the impediments which exist to granting their request. It would also be helpful for the State Department to know what attitude Dr. Mackenzie and others concerned in Ottawa are inclined to take in regard to the request made by the United Kingdom, having regard to its broad implications on our relations with the United Kingdom at the present time.

I should be grateful if you would treat this enquiry of mine as a fairly urgent one and let me have as soon as possible at least some idea of what you and Dr. Mackenzie think about this matter.

Yours sincerely,
H.H.WRONG

Following for N.A. Robertson from Wrong, Begins: My letter to you of March 19th.

1. There seems to be trouble brewing with London over the matter dealt with in my letter. I had assumed that Mackenzie had kept the British informed of the agreement to dispose of our output here, but Marten of the British Embassy told Ignatieff yesterday that we were likely to receive strong representations from London if we are unable because of this agreement to furnish the British with the quantity they need. He has learnt that the United States authorities are not disposed to concur in the provision to the British of this quantity.

2. We have no information about the exact terms of our agreement with the United States authorities except what we have picked up from the State Department. I assume that it has been definitely concluded and that its contents includes only the exceptions mentioned in my letter. Marten was most emphatic in emphasizing the necessity of the supply from Canada to enable the British programme to go forward and said that it was a question of high political importance.

3. I expect that Clutterbuck will be getting in touch with you or Heeney shortly, if he has not already done so. Please keep me informed of developments. Ends.

Following for N.A. Robertson from Wrong, Begins: Reference my message WA-1079 and my letter to you of March 19th.

1. After my conversation with you on Thursday, Arneson was told that MacKenzie, Solandt and yourself are of the opinion that it would put an unreasonably legalistic construction upon the agreement recently concluded with the United States to deny the British request.

2. Arneson said that he was glad to know this, but offered the suggestion that, considering the important political implications of this question, it would be desirable to have formal consultations between the three Governments through the CPC channel before a decision is made. He noted that the matter had come to the attention of the State Department only as a result of an informal inquiry made through Langmuir at Chalk River to the United States AEC. In a matter of this kind, the State Department and Defence Department, as well as the United States AEC have to be consulted. In view of the terms of the agreement, he thought that a strong recommendation that the British request be granted, together with supporting arguments, should be submitted formally by the Canadian Government to the United States Government if the present objections on technical or legal grounds are to be overcome insofar as Washington is concerned.

3. As the British will probably bring up the political and military implications of their request in any case, it seems to me that there would be an advantage in following the course suggested by Arneson. If you agree, perhaps you would let me have a letter which I could give to the State Department through Arneson, together with some background information. In particular, I should like to know what the British have been told about our agreement with the United States, which, I understand, has now been signed. Ends.

Washington, April 2, 1951

Dear Mr. Bennett:

This is in reference to our recent telephone conversations and your letter of March 16, 1951, regarding proposed changes in the uranium purchase agreement between the Commission and Eldorado as covered by my letter of April 7, 1950. You have pointed out that on March 6, 1950, you announced an extension of your published price schedule from March 31, 1958 through March 31, 1960, and a special development allowance of $1.25 per pound of uranium oxide to be payable for the first three years' production from any mine.

You discussed these proposed changes with me by telephone prior to the announcement, and it was agreed that Eldorado would request a revision of the purchase terms set forth in my letter of April 7, 1950, to cover the changes made in your public buying schedule.

I am authorized by the Commission to advise you that in accordance with your request of March 16, 1951, paragraph 3 of my letter of April 7, 1950 is hereby amended to read as follows:

> "... the Commission is prepared to purchase from Canada all the uranium produced under this program through March 31st, 1960, up to a total of 8,000 tons, and under a ceiling price for black oxide of $11.25 (U.S. Currency) per pound of U_3O_8 content. Appropriate contracts will be made from time to time."

Also, in paragraph 4 of said letter $11.25 shall be substituted in place of $10.00.

In this connection we would appreciate a statement such as that in your letter dated April 12, 1950 that Eldorado is prepared to extend from March 31, 1958 to March 31, 1960 the period during which it will sell all the uranium produced in Canada under the guaranteed buying schedule, up to a total of 8,000 tons, except such quantities as the Canadian Government may desire to retain for its own use.

We appreciate your co-operation in our joint effort to increase uranium production from the North American continent.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Robertson:

The visit of Dr. Mackenzie and Dr. Solandt to Washington has provided the opportunity for useful talks on some of the outstanding questions relating to atomic energy.[115] I think that the question of the plutonium for the United Kingdom, which I wrote you about on March 19th, has now been cleared up to the satisfaction of all parties. Dr. Mackenzie saw the Chairman of the U.S.A.E.C., Mr. Dean, as well as Mr. Summer Pike, and got an assurance from them that they would regard the loan of the small amount now contemplated as not incompatible with the terms of the purchase agreement between Canada and the United States. In a talk at my house last night with Mr. R. Gordon Arneson it was also agreed that as the matter had been settled informally there was no need to bring the C.P.C. into the picture. The British Embassy has been informed through Marten, the U.K. Joint Secretary of the C.P.C., and nothing more in my judgment needs to be done about it.

Having Messrs. Mackenzie, Solandt and Arneson together yesterday evening also provided a useful opportunity to review the prospects for resuming the tripartite talks in the C.P.C.[116] Mr. Arneson explained the tactics which were now being followed in trying to obtain the support and approval of the Joint Congressional Committee for a revision of the tripartite arrangements before the talks are resumed. This is, of course, necessary since it is assumed that any change in the present arrangements involving a more liberal policy of interchanging information, materials and personnel would involve an amendment to the McMahon Act.

Arneson said that previously the State Department and the U.S.A.E.C. had made the running in arguing for a revision of the arrangements. They had based their case mainly on the argument that a more liberal exchange of information was a desirable objective in itself, so that the experience and knowledge of the three countries could be better utilized in their respective atomic energy programs. This time the intention was to place principal emphasis on the security needs of the United States. In this connection the State Department had already engaged the interest of General Bedell Smith and the C.I.A., as well as of the Pentagon, in the important advantages which the United States would derive from a freer exchange of information in the field of long-range detection. It was recognized that the very limited exchange now permissable did not enable the United States to keep sufficient track of production rates in the Soviet Union. Apparently the provisions of the McMahon Act rule out an exchange of information on this subject, which is referred to as "Krypton 85".

Dr. Mackenzie, in his conversations with the Commissioners of the U.S.A.E.C., as well as with Gordon Arneson, was able to make good use of an additional argument which should carry considerable weight with the Joint Congressional Committee; namely, the hindrances to the United States tritium program resulting from the fact that the engineers and technicians of the Dupont Company now at Chalk River are prohibited under the terms of the McMahon Act from revealing the U.S. plans for which they require technical assistance at Chalk River.

Arneson mentioned that one device that was now under consideration for the revision of the McMahon Act was to suggest an amendment along the following lines: "The United States will not make restricted data available to any foreign government, except in cases where the Secretaries of Defense and of State and the Chairman of the U.S.A.E.C. determine this to be in the interests of the security of the United States". The idea apparently would be to keep the Joint Congressional Committee regularly informed of the exceptions made under this amendment, which would be regarded as approved after a delay of thirty days unless specifically prohibited in the meantime by legislative action initiated by the Joint Congressional Committee.

Arneson expressed himself generally as rather optimistic about the prospects of resuming the tripartite talks on a satisfactory basis. I believe that the talks which Dr. Mackenzie and Dr. Solandt had in Washington on these subjects have been very helpful, although they, as well as I, have always stressed our comparatively marginal interest in working out an agreement concerned with the development of atomic weapons.

Yours sincerely,

H.H. WRONG

Memorandum from Head, Defence Liaison (1) Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], August 28, 1951

SOME COMMENTS ON RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN ATOMIC ENERGY

In February we prepared a memorandum (copy attached) speculating on atomic weapons tests held shortly before in Nevada. Since that time there has appeared further information concerning the U.S. atomic weapons programme, and material has been made public which suggests interesting developments in other directions within the field of atomic energy. It may be worthwhile to attempt to tie together the most significant of these recent developments; it is recognized, of course, that Dr. Solandt and Mr. Glazebrook are probably much better informed than we on some of the subjects involved.

Further Developments in Atomic Weapons

2. Since the Nevada tests, a further series of weapons tests has been carried out at Eniwetok Island in the Pacific Ocean. Little specific information has been given out concerning the military aspects of this most recent series, but it has been made clear that they were on a more elaborate scale than those in Nevada and involved weapons of considerably greater power. The original atomic bombs used against Japan were equivalent in power to 20,000 tons of high explosive; it has been stated by the Alsop brothers that at least one of the Eniwetok bombs was equivalent to 100,000 tons of high explosive. There has been further evidence, also, to support the view expressed in our earlier memorandum that among the weapons tested at Nevada were prototypes of weapons suitable for tactical use in the field.

3. During recent conversations with Mr. Robert LeBaron, U.S. Assistant Under-Secretary of Defence responsible for the scientific side of the defence programme, Dr. Mackenzie received a convincing account of the vast scale of the present atomic weapons programme. Newspaper references to the "mass production" of these weapons are apparently fairly close to the truth and the U.S.A.E.C. has indicated that in the future test detonations can be expected fairly frequently.

Progress in Other Directions

4. The most recent report of the U.S.A.E.C., and various statements by U.S.A.E.C. spokesmen and others, have made public the fact that considerable progress has been made towards other than direct military uses of atomic energy. Hard upon the report that the construction of an atom driven power unit suitable for submarines was proceeding satisfactorily has followed the recent announcement that the U.S. Navy has let a contract for the first atom-powered submarine. The development of an atomic power plant for aircraft is also reported to be progressing. Finally, the first atomic "breeder" reactor is now completed and preliminary operations tests are believed to be underway.

5. These various developments, coupled with the steady improvement in the efficiency and versatility of atomic weapons invite speculation as to the future. Some of the matters on which one is tempted to speculate are the availability of raw materials (both in a short range and in a long range sense), the probability of atomic power coming into practical use for other than military purposes, and the future relationship of atomic weapons to the balance of military power.

Availability of Fissionable Material

6. The annual production of natural uranium is increasing steadily in the Western countries and, we may suspect, behind the Iron Curtain as well. Yet the total amount of uranium in the earth's crust is believed to be relatively limited, and a time can be foreseen when the rate of annual production will begin to fall off as the richer deposits are exhausted. That time is not yet upon us, and we may expect that for the next few years or perhaps decades the present rate of production can be maintained or increased. At the present stage of technical knowledge a relatively rare component (comprising about 7/10 of 1%) of natural uranium is the sole source of fissionable material. This component can be made to undergo fission under a variety of conditions; it may itself (when separated from the non-fissionable major component) be used in an atomic bomb, or it may (either by itself or mixed in varying proportions with the major component) be used in a controlled chain reaction carried out in an atomic reactor or "pile". When it is used in a pile, some of the neutrons produced in fission may be used to convert either the major component of natural uranium or other substances into new, man-made fissionable materials. These man-made fissionable materials, however, are obtained at the expense of using up some of the supply of fissionable material obtained from natural sources. So far no pile has yet been made to produce as much fissionable material as is required to make it run.

7. A breeder pile is one which will produce more fissionable material or "atomic fuel" (to use the journalists' term) than it consumes. It has been known for some time that such a pile is theoretically possible, but the technical problems in designing one are formidable. If the breeder pile now being tested by the U.S.A.E.C. should operate as its designers expect, the event will be of tremendous significance in an historical perspective. Every atomic bomb that is exploded, every electric generator which may in future consume atomic fuel destroys a part of the finite natural supply of this fuel. Sooner or later that supply will be exhausted, unless a means can be found of using a certain fraction of that total supply to increase the amount available. The success of a breeder pile would offer the assurance that it is technically possible, using as raw material various relatively plentiful substances to increase the limited quantity of atomic fuel now to be found in the world.

8. On the other hand, the successful operation of a breeder pile would not have any considerable effect on the available supply of fissionable material for some time. Even one operated at the theoretical limit of its efficiency would produce only a small fractional increase for each complete cycle, and an operation equivalent to a complete cycle of the original fuel supply would extend over many months or, more probably, years. Recent press comments are therefore misleading in suggesting that the expected success of the new breeder pile will make an early and significant contribution in the movement "from extreme scarcity toward relative plenty in the vital atomic field". The partial truth in the statement that such a movement is taking place lies in the steady increase in the annual output of the mines and processing plants. It is also true that increases are steadily being made in the efficiency with which the available fissionable material can be used for military purposes, but it must be remembered that this increase may be paralleled behind the Iron Curtain.

9. In two recent articles the Alsops have indicated that the U.S.A.E.C. has been successful in developing a procedure for exploding "sub-critical" amounts of fissionable material. While new techniques may have made possible the explosion of amounts slightly less than what has previously been considered the essential minimum, it is most unlikely that any such improvement is quantitatively significant. More likely this refers to bombs in which explosive power has been sacrificed to gain in lightness and compactness, but with no saving in fissionable material.

Atomic Energy as a Means of Producing Power

10. The problems in using atomic reactors to drive generating stations or motors are plentiful but practical. In other words, they are problems of design, of development of suitable construction materials and of engineering techniques and not in the most important sense problems of theory. Information from the U.K., which has a more immediate practical interest in obtaining industrial power from its atomic programme than has the U.S., indicates that the U.K. does not expect to have electric generating stations driven by atomic energy before perhaps 1960. One reason for this presumably is that such an accomplishment would only be valuable if it could be attained at a cost comparable with the cost of conventional methods. The apparent expectation in the U.S. of using atomic power plants for submarines and perhaps military aircraft within a matter or two or three years is a clear indication that if it were worthwhile such power plants could be made within the same time limit to drive industrial equipment or ordinary sea-going vessels. That such a programme is not contemplated results from the fact that the estimated costs would not be justified by the utility. The great advantages for military purposes of using atomic power plants derive from the increase of range without refuelling resulting from the small volume of fuel required for a given energy output, and (for submarines) from the fact that operation does not require a supply of air. But it may be expected that if atomic power plants are in use even for very special purposes by about 1955 it should not require many years before their cost can be reduced to a level which would greatly widen their range of application.

Atomic Weapons as an Element in Military Power

11. It is reasonably certain that the U.S. now has available atomic weapons of considerable efficiency (both in terms of utilization of raw material and of adaptation to specific military uses) and it appears likely that among these are or soon will be weapons suitable for tactical use against armies and possibly naval or air units. One factor which will greatly contribute to the military value of such weapons is the development of guided missiles sufficiently reliable for practical use and capable of carrying atomic war heads. The latest information which has been received suggests that the guided missile programme is now more or less through the development stage and is rapidly approaching the production stage. If this is the case, it may be expected that within two or three years atomic weapons will be available for a wide range of applications of high military value. No doubt we have a certain lead over the U.S.S.R. in such matters, a lead which for practical military purposes may be greater during the next two years than in the past five, but we cannot assume that this lead will be of decisive value for long; indeed it might well not be decisive even if war were to break out now. Yet there is little doubt that at the present stage our presumed superiority in both quantity and efficiency of atomic weapons and guided missiles would be of great importance not only in connection with a strategic bombing programme but in connection with the land and air campaign which would occur in Western Europe.[117]

RESTRICTED [Ottawa], February 28, 1951

I refer to your memorandum of February 22, 1951,† in which you enquired as to the present position concerning the fraudulent sale of Canadian stocks in the United States, and asked me to draft a letter to Mr. Wrong.

2. You will recall that Parliament, in 1942, refused to approve an amendment to our Extradition Treaty with the United States which proposed to make the fraudulent dealing in securities an extraditable offence, after strong protests had been received from Toronto brokerage interests and various mining organizations across Canada. These bodies argued that strict compliance with United States securities legislation would seriously hamper the flow of United States venture capital to the Canadian mining industry. The argument was also raised at that time that securities legislation in Canada is a matter within the jurisdiction of the Provinces and that the Federal Government does not have the power to enter into the "policing" of the securities field in an indirect manner through an extradition treaty.

3. A further attempt was made in 1945, after consultation with the Provinces, to find an unobjectionable formula for the extradition of persons involved in security frauds. This resulted in the drafting of a new formula which was presented to Parliament, again in that year, in the form of a Protocol. After the same groups, which protested the ratification of the original amendment, had again protested the ratification of the new Protocol, Parliament shelved consideration of the problem and referred it to the Standing Committee on External Affairs. The latter's report was referred by Cabinet back to the Department of External Affairs. The problem was then considered by an interdepartmental committee in 1946 and 1947. This committee could not come to a firm decision as to what action should be taken. It appears that the constitutional problem prevented further action and the question remained in abeyance until October, 1950.

4. Since this date, the United States Embassy in Ottawa and the Securities Exchange Commission in Washington have been pressing for reconsideration of an extradition treaty which would make the fraudulent dealing in securities an extraditable offence. On February 7, 1951, the Canadian Ambassador in Washington informed the Department that the United States Embassy in Ottawa had been instructed to press for a meeting between officials of the Securities Exchange Commission and appropriate Canadian officials. We have now received the opinion of the Department of Justice to the effect that it would not be advisable to renew efforts to make securities offenders extraditable. When Mr. Morgan of the United States Embassy called to see me on February 20, 1951, I suggested that no useful purpose would be served by continuing the previous approach to this problem. I suggested instead that the Securities Exchange Commission might deal directly with the Ontario Securities Commission and try to achieve some working arrangement by which the operations of the individuals concerned could be checked by appropriate administrative action under provincial legislation.

5. You may agree that an arrangement between the two Commissions for the solution of the problem might obviate the need for further intervention by the federal authorities in a question which is fraught with constitutional difficulties. I think this new approach might bring about the desired result. At least it will forcibly bring the problem to the attention of the Ontario authorities. Economic Division concurs in this.[118]

FRAUDULENT SALE OF SECURITIES IN THE UNITED STATES

You will recollect our conversation in Ottawa on this subject.

2. Mr. Morgan, Counsellor in the United States Embassy here, called to see Mr. Burbridge on February 20, 1951, to discuss the fraudulent sale of securities in the United States. As you indicated in the above-mentioned message, he proposed that officials of the Securities Exchange Commission, Washington, meet with the appropriate Canadian officials in Ottawa to put forward suggestions for a new extradition treaty and to acquaint them with the increase in the volume of allegedly fraudulent promotional literature originating from Toronto.

3. In the course of the discussion it was suggested to Mr. Morgan that no useful purpose would be served in arranging a meeting in Ottawa to discuss the elimination of objectionable features from the treaty proposed in 1942, which would still make securities fraud offenders liable to extradition. We do not think that it would be advisable to revive the question of including a section in a new extradition treaty to regard fraud in the sale or purchase of securities as an extraditable offence. Should this question be raised again in Parliament, it is most likely that the same objections would be voiced as in 1942, when Parliament declined to approve the ratification of the proposed treaty of that year. The Department of Justice has confirmed our view in this respect and agrees that it would not be advisable "to negotiate an agreement on a basis formerly found objectionable". (A copy of a letter of December 15, 1950,† from the Department of Justice, is attached for your information).

4. It was then suggested to Mr. Morgan that it might be better for the Securities Exchange Commission to approach the Ontario Securities Commission to arrange a modus operandi for the elimination of the operations of the individuals concerned by appropriate administrative action of the Ontario authorities under provincial legislation. A study of the history of the problem reveals that relations between the Securities Exchange Commission and the Ontario Securities Commission have not been as carefully nurtured in the past as they might have been, and that the objections from the Ontario Attorney-General's Department to the 1942 Treaty may have been due in part to the absence of good relations between the two securities commissions. Co-operation between the two commissions might result in some solution of the problem. On the other hand, negotiation between the Canadian Government and the Securities Exchange Commission, without the full co-operation of the Ontario authorities, would not bring about the desired results. You will recall that one of the principal arguments against Parliamentary ratification of a new treaty making these offences extraditable crimes was that legislation with respect to securities in Canada is a matter within the jurisdiction of the Provinces, and that the Federal Government has no power to police the securities field in an indirect manner through an extradition treaty.

5. At the conclusion of the meeting, Mr. Morgan was told that Mr. Matthews, who is familiar with the problem and has already discussed it with officials of the Securities Exchange Commission, would be asked to approach the Commission informally to suggest that they take either of the two following steps:

(1) The Securities Exchange Commission might approach the Ontario Securities Commission directly and put their problems before them.

(2) The State Department might request the Canadian Government through you, or through the United States Embassy in Ottawa, to arrange a meeting between representatives of the Securities Exchange Commission and appropriate officials of the Ontario Government.

Any ensuing discussions might be directed to developing a modus operandi on a mutual and co-operative basis for the elimination of abuses in the sale of securities.

6. I should be grateful if you would ask Mr. Matthews to approach the Securities Exchange Commission and put these suggestions to them.

FRAUDULENT SALE OF SECURITIES IN THE UNITED STATES

In your letter you advised me of the discussions held in Ottawa with the Counsellor of the United States Embassy on the question of the fraudulent sale of securities and suggested that I ask Mr. Matthews to propose to the Securities and Exchange Commission that a meeting should be arranged between them and the Ontario Securities Commission.

2. As I pointed out in my letter of October 18, 1949, to Mr. Heeney, I consider this question to be a matter of general policy which affects the relations between the two countries. This being the case, I think it would be inappropriate to deal with proposals taken up on numerous occasions with the Canadian Government by the Department of State, in Washington and in Ottawa, by opening discussions with the SEC. For the same reason I think that we should no longer resist the strenuous effort made by the United States authorities to discuss the possibility of re-opening negotiations for an extradition treaty covering security frauds. The suggestion contained in your letter is, in fact, a refusal even to discuss this matter, since it proposes instead that some modus operandi might be worked out between the SEC and the Ontario Securities Commission either with or without the assistance of the appropriate officials of the Canadian Government.

3. For these reasons, instead of complying with your suggestion I asked Mr. Matthews to arrange an interview with officials of the State Department to find out what had been their reaction to Mr. Morgan's report of his interview with Mr. Burbridge on February 20, 1951, and what further instructions they might propose to send to Mr. Morgan.

4. Yesterday Mr. Matthews saw Mr. Haselton, Officer in charge of Dominion Affairs, and Mr. Divens of the Legal Division of the State Department. He was advised that the United States officials have been disturbed by Mr. Morgan's report and were sending to him instructions to take this matter up again with External Affairs. It was pointed out that the United States authorities consider the fraudulent sale of securities by dealers operating from Canada to be a matter of growing seriousness. The SEC is under considerable pressure to take some action to prevent these sales, and it has only been at the request of the State Department that they have not launched an active publicity campaign against the sale of Canadian securities in the United States. Unless further discussions do take place, the State Department is doubtful whether they will be able to restrain the SEC from undertaking such a campaign.

5. While the enclosures forwarded with this Embassy's letter #2875 of November 9, 1950, implied that the SEC would not be ready to accept the principle of double criminality in an extradition treaty covering security frauds, it was pointed out in that letter and also in letter #2693 of October 26, 1950, that the impression gathered in discussing this matter with officers of State Department and the SEC was that the United States authorities would in fact be ready to accept that principle in any new treaty that might be negotiated.

6. Mr. Divens, who has been in close touch for many years with the legal officers of the SEC, yesterday stated very definitely that the United States authorities would be ready to accept a treaty that entirely eliminated reference to registration offences and would be confined to offences falling within the section of the Canadian Criminal Code relating to mail fraud and the obtaining of monies under false pretences. Mr. Divens was afraid that Mr. Morgan may not have made this point quite clear to the officers of the Department in Ottawa. Since your suggestion appears to have been based to a considerable extent upon a letter from the Department of Justice dated December 15 which asserted that 'single criminality' was the particularly objectionable feature of the U.S. proposals, Mr. Divens' doubts in this respect may be well founded.

7. The State Department officers also pointed out that the SEC is in constant touch with the Ontario Securities Commission; therefore, they do not think that further meetings as suggested in paragraph 5(1) of your letter would serve any useful purpose. They have an open mind on the suggestion contained in paragraph 5(2), if that is meant to lead to three-cornered discussions between officers of the two federal governments and officers of the Ontario Government. Their only hesitation in regard to this suggestion is that if a clear line of division should develop between the Ontario Government and the Canadian Government, the domestic political difficulties with which the Canadian Government is faced, and of which the State Department is fully aware, would be intensified. For this reason I am satisfied that United States officials would prefer preliminary informal talks with Canadian officials even though it might be necessary at a later date to arrange talks amongst the three parties.

8. As I have mentioned, I consider this problem to be a matter of some importance, which unless tackled may have an unfortunate effect on our relations in other connections; for that reason I think it essential that we should comply with the United States request that they be given an opportunity to lay before Canadian officials the present facts, and to make any suggestions that might overcome our difficulties in agreeing to open negotiations for an extradition treaty. While the United States authorities appear to be already fully aware that discussions looking towards a treaty would be futile if the principle of double criminality was not retained in full, this point could be emphasized when we advise them that we are ready to have informal talks.

9. It may be that some means could be developed of coping with the issue which would not involve the conclusion of extradition arrangements to which strong objection would be taken in Canada. If the character and extent of the dubious operations now being carried on from Toronto is as great as the SEC believes, might not the Ontario Government, if approached at a high level, be ready to put an end to these objectionable practices, especially if they were aware that their continuance would lead the SEC to start some sort of a publicity campaign?

10. Another matter which seems to have dropped out of consideration is the general desirability of modernizing and codifying our extradition arrangements with the United States. It was, I think, in 1930 that the drafting of a new treaty was undertaken, and I recall a series of meetings here on this subject in which I took part. The draft then produced later became the basis of the Treaty signed in 1942, which has not come into effect solely because it contains the objectionable element of 'single criminality' in respect of security offences. Extradition proceedings therefore are still conducted under a patchwork series of treaties beginning well over a hundred years ago and for the most part concluded between the British and United States Governments.

Memorandum by Legal Division

[Ottawa], March 14, 1951

On March 14, Mr. Allan Anderson telephoned to say that he had received a call from a reporter of the Toronto Telegram who wanted to know if the Canadian Government was carrying on any discussions with the United States Government concerning the extradition of brokers selling stocks over the border. This reporter had seen the first of the articles in the St. Louis Post Despatch. He also informed Mr. Anderson that there was a series of radio broadcasts starting over the NBC, and that the SEC had a battery of eight men in Toronto who were digging up information for these broadcasts. Mr. Anderson asked what statement might be made concerning the query as to the discussions with the United States Government.

2. Subsequently, on the same day (March 14), a meeting was held in Mr. Heeney's office, attended by Mr. Plumptre, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Erichsen-Brown, and Mr. Grandy. There was directed to the attention of the meeting Mr. Wrong's Despatch No. 856 of March 10, 1951, in which he had taken a rather strong line against our suggestion that the SEC deal directly with Ontario but was in favour of our consenting to the holding of discussions. Mr. Anderson also reported on his discussions with the Telegram.

3. It was decided:

(a) That a memorandum should be prepared by Legal Division in consultation with American Division, for submission to Cabinet, requesting instructions as to whether discussions should be held and whether the Ontario authorities should be invited to participate.

(b) That Mr. Anderson should reply to the Telegram by saying that no discussions were taking place with the United States Government at the present time.

EXTRADITION FOR SECURITIES FRAUDS

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said the U.S. government had been pressing for re-opening of negotiations on a new or revised treaty under which persons selling securities (by mail, telephone and telegraph) across the border into the United States could be extradited for trial in the United States for violation of its laws. The Province of Ontario was in a special position in relation to this problem. It was recommended that:

(a) officials of the Departments of Justice, Finance, Secretary of State and External Affairs be authorized to enter into discussions in Canada with officials of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the U.S. Embassy;

(b) authority be given to invite officials representing the Ontario Securities Commission and the Department of the Attorney General of Ontario to participate in such discussions; and,

(c) the invitation to the Ontario authorities be by letters from the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Deputy Attorney General of Ontario and the Chairman of the Ontario Securities Commission.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, March 21, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 88-51)†

2. The Postmaster General suggested that, as operations in the sale of securities were frequently conducted by mail, it might be desirable to have a representative of the Post Office present at discussions.

3. The Prime Minister thought that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should have a preliminary discussion with the Attorney General of Ontario before any letters were exchanged.

4. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed that officials of the Departments of Justice, Finance, Secretary of State, External Affairs and Post Office be authorized to enter into discussions with officials of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the U.S. Embassy and that, subject to satisfactory preliminary exchanges with the Attorney General of Ontario, invitations be extended to officials of the Ontario Securities Commission and the Department of the Attorney General of Ontario to participate in the discussions.

Note du ministre de la Justice pour le Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 165-51 Ottawa, June 5, 1951

EXTRADITION FOR SECURITIES FRAUDS

In accordance with the Minute of Cabinet of April 4, 1951 and following a conversation between the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and Mr. Dana Porter, Attorney General of Ontario, discussions with officials of the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States took place on May 1 and 2 in the presence of the Deputy Attorney General of Ontario and the Chairman of the Ontario Securities Commission.

2. In a preliminary exchange of views with the Ontario officials, it was agreed that there should be no extradition for technical offences such as failure to register, but only for fraud in the broad sense of the Canadian Criminal Code and that the traditional rule of double criminality should be retained in regard to extradition for securities frauds.

3. It will be recalled that for some years the United States had maintained the position that there should be extradition on the basis of single criminality of persons guilty of an offence against specific United States laws which however would not be an offence against any law in Canada. After the three-way discussions had opened, it became clear that the United States representatives, although reluctant, were willing to concede the principle of double criminality. They also stated that they were willing to restrict extradition to cases involving fraud provided that they could prosecute under their federal rather than state legislation. The Convention of 1900 proclaimed in Canada on September 14, 1901, had added to the list of extraditable crimes:

"11. Obtaining money, valuable securities, or other property by false pretences."

The domestic legislation corresponding to this provision is in Canada section 405 of the Criminal Code, and in the United States the criminal laws of 48 states. The regulation in the public interest of the sale of securities in the United States has been assumed by the federal agency, the S.E.C. which now dominates the field. Its authority is based on the provisions of the United States' Constitution as to the regulation of inter-state commerce and the use of the mails.

5. The United States representatives claimed that section 17(a) of the (federal) Securities Act, 1933, was directed against fraud in the sale of securities in a broad way and not in any narrow technical sense. They also maintained that this provision of their federal act was similar to section 444 (as amended in 1948) of the Canadian Criminal Code, and that the United States Mail Fraud Statute was similar to section 209(c) of the Canadian Criminal Code. For these reasons, they argued that it was possible to equate the federal legislation of both countries and thus eliminate what was a serious jurisdictional problem for them in attempting to extradite under the existing treaty. Both the Canadian and Ontario officials agreed that it would be desirable to broaden the scope of the false pretences section of the existing treaty so as to permit extradition for crimes under the legislation abovementioned.

6. Several alternative wordings were considered and eventually the officials of all three governments agreed to report back and recommend the acceptance of a wording, the text of which appears in a schedule to this memorandum. The Canadian officials in agreeing to recommend the acceptance of this text, however, pointed out that a minor amendment to section 209(c) of the Criminal Code would be necessary. The nature of this amendment is also indicated in the annexed schedule.

7. Mr. Lennox, Head of the Ontario Securities Commission, raised a collateral issue in the course of the discussions. It appeared that the requirements for registration with the S.E.C. are extremely burdensome and expensive — so much so that it is practically impossible for small concerns seeking to raise capital in the United States to comply with them. (This fact was featured by a number of witnesses before the Standing Committee on External Affairs in 1945). The general rule of the S.E.C. is that all securities must comply with the full requirements both domestic and foreign. However, the Commissioners of the S.E.C. have a discretionary power to exempt issues not exceeding $300,000 in any one year of United States companies provided that they complete a short form application only. The Ontario Securities Commission has been pressing the S.E.C. for some time to secure an amendment from Congress which would permit exemption of Ontario companies under similar conditions. The S.E.C. representatives said that there are two difficulties:

(a) an administrative one—When the short form procedure is followed the S.E.C.'s powers are restricted to prosecutions for fraud "after the event". (They admitted that this objection would be lessened, if not removed, by an extradition treaty of the type envisaged.)

(b) a political one—Congress would not likely consent to a discretionary power to extend the summary procedure to foreign companies generally, and exemption of Canadian companies only from the full requirements would create difficulties in South America.

8. The collateral issue mentioned in the last paragraph was not put forward by the Ontario representatives, as a condition of their concurrence on any extradition arrangement. It was clear however that Ontario would welcome any pressure which could be put on the United States to reduce the present burden upon Canadian companies seeking to register with the S.E.C.

9. The proposed text would involve extradition for crimes corresponding to crimes under the Criminal Code only and there would remain no possible basis upon which any province could challenge the constitutional powers of the federal authorities.

10. It is suggested that if the United States Government concurs in the recommended text, every effort should be made to sign the treaty as soon as possible and that ratification take place shortly thereafter. Prior to ratification, the treaty might be tabled in the House. It is not necessary that ratification be authorized by Parliament having regard to the fact that there will be no fundamental change in the law (such as the introduction of a rule of single criminality contemplated in 1945 which would have changed the law in force for 100 years) and having regard also to the terms of the extradition act.

THE UNDERSIGNED accordingly after consultation with the Department of External Affairs recommends:

(a) That authority be given to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in consultation with the Minister of Justice to negotiate a supplementary convention to the extradition treaty of 1842 with the United States, by which there would be substituted for the crime of obtaining false pretences as set forth in the supplementary convention of 1900, provisions substantially the same as in the text in the schedule hereto.

(b) That Parliament be asked to approve an amendment to Section 209(c) of the Criminal Code as set forth in the schedule hereto.

(c) That an effort be made in the negotiations with the United States to secure an extension to Canadian companies of the short form registration procedure for small issues now restricted to United States Companies, but that an amendment of United States legislation, to so provide be not made a condition of ratification of any supplementary convention negotiated under (a).

(d) That a suitable letter be sent by the Deputy Minister of Justice, in consultation with the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Deputy Attorneys General of the provinces, informing them of the proposed supplementary convention.[120]

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Schedule

Replace the existing extraditable crime:

"11. Obtaining money, valuable securities, or other property by false pretences."

By the following:

"11. Obtaining property, money or valuable securities by false pretences or by defrauding the public or any person by deceit or falsehood or other fraudulent means, whether such deceit or falsehood or any fraudulent means would or would not amount to a false pretence.

11A. Making use of the mails in connection with schemes devised or intended to deceive or defraud the public or for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences."

Amendment to Section 209(c) of Criminal Code:

"S. 209. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who posts for transmission or delivery by or through the post, who makes use of the mails for the purpose of transmitting or delivering: *
(c) any letter or circular concerning schemes devised or intended to deceive and defraud the public, or for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences."

[120] Le 7 juin 1951, le Cabinet a accepté de modifier le paragraphe 209(c) du Code pénal, comme il avait été recommandé. Il a différé sa décision au sujet des autres recommandations jusqu'à ce que la modification du paragraphe 209(c) ait reçu la sanction royale.
Cabinet agreed on June 7, 1951 to amend Section 209(c) of the Criminal Code as recommended. It deferred decision on the other recommendations until the amendment to Section 209(c) had been given Royal Assent.

*The amendment would make the essence of the offence the use of the mails rather than posting with the objective that this section would (like the U.S. Mail Fraud Statute as interpreted by the U.S. courts), cover the use of the Canadian mails regardless of the country of posting. A possibly restrictive interpretation consequent upon the use of the word "posting" would thus be avoided.

Legal Division to Minister, Embassy in United States

Ottawa, August 8, 1951

Dear Mr. Matthews,

I am indeed sorry to have created the impression that we have been neglecting to keep you informed on developments in the matter of a proposed amendment to the Extradition Treaty. The fact of the matter is, that I failed to prepare a reply to your telegram of June 15th† owing to an oversight. There are only two points on which we might have informed you, firstly, the action taken by Cabinet on June 5th (set forth in our telegram of to-day's date),† and, secondly, the draft received from the Embassy referred to in your telegram.

In connection with the latter I may say that we had not actually received it on that date. Mr. Morgan of the United States Embassy telephoned around the beginning of June to say that the officials in Washington had approved of the amendment agreed on at the Conference, but had suggested that it might be desirable to confirm the interpretation which the officials concerned intended to put upon the new text. This was at a time when the memorandum had already gone to Cabinet but we had not yet learned of its decision. When Cabinet decided to postpone its decision on the question of policy, I suggested to Mr. Morgan that we put off discussions until the policy had been decided. At that time we did not know how soon the Bill to amend the Criminal Code would go through the House.

Upon receipt of your wire of June 15th I decided that we had better have a look at the S.E.C. proposal and invited Mr. Morgan to come over and bring the draft with him. The draft is simple and the operative words read: "The enumeration numbered 11 in Article 1 of the Supplementary Extradition Convention signed on December 13th, 1900, between the United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty is hereby amended to read as follows: ("Paragraphs drafted at the Conference inserted here as Nos. 11a and 11b"). Mr. Morgan proposed to submit this draft to us under cover of a note, a draft of which is annexed.† (He was rather diffident about the text of this proposed note on the ground that he was not a lawyer).

It appeared to me that this note was generally consistent with the discussions, but I was doubtful as to whether the third main paragraph beginning "It is the understanding ..." was desirable. It seemed to me that the Treaty would have to speak for itself. Some discussion with Mr. Varcoe was required, but it did not seem appropriate to ask him for his views until the question of policy had been decided.

The press reports have naturally led you to assume that more has happened here than has actually transpired. Mr. Lennox, the Ontario Security Commissioner, was called as a witness before a Committee of the Ontario Legislature and disclosed the fact of the participation of Ontario officials in the Conference at Ottawa at the invitation of the Canadian Government. It is clear that the Ontario authorities have been most discreet concerning these discussions and have also been anxious to co-operate with the Canadian Government. They continue to be very much concerned at the refusal of the S.E.C. to permit Canadian companies to use its short form registration procedure for small issues. You will recall that there has been some reluctance on the part of the S.E.C. to extend this privilege to Canadian companies for fear of similar demands from Latin America.

The Committee of the Ontario Legislature decided to request Mr. MacDonald [sic], Chairman of the S.E.C., to attend before it as a witness. Mr. Morgan saw the press report on this item and called me as to what our attitude might be. I took the line that the Canadian Government would welcome any co-operation between the United States and Ontario authorities. I also took the occasion to remind Morgan that we shared the view of the Ontario authorities as to the desirability of extending the short form registration procedure to Canadian companies. I have heard nothing further in this connection.

The recommendation before Cabinet suggests that an effort be made in the negotiations for an Extradition Treaty, to have the short form registration procedure extended to Canadian companies, but that such an extension be not made a condition for a Treaty.

Ken Burbridge is still away on leave. Things have been a bit hectic. I have worked the last three week-ends and it is partly owing to pressure of work that I did not write you before. Actually Mr. Moran spoke to me about Mr. Wrong's letter and I prepared a summary, which I thought (erroneously it turns out) had been sent on to you.

The Barcelona file has been in the care of Mr. Summers since August 1950. I understand he has made an effort to keep you informed, but he feels, and I am inclined to agree with him, that it is difficult and perhaps unnecessary to keep you fully informed on everything which transpires. He is preparing a despatch to you on the subject which will go out shortly.

With kindest regards, I am,

Yours sincerely,

EXTRADITION FOR SECURITIES FRAUDS

1. This despatch will give you the latest information on the proposed supplementary Convention amending the supplementary Extradition Convention signed on December 13, 1900; and authorize you to make representations to the United States Government requesting the extension to Canadian companies of the short form registration procedure now available only to United States companies under existing United States law.

2. My telegram under reference, supplemented by Mr. Erichsen-Brown's letter of August 8, 1951, informs you that the United States Embassy has submitted a draft of the proposed supplementary Convention. The draft was considered satisfactory as to substance by the Deputy Minister of Justice and this Department. The United States Embassy in Ottawa was so informed, and that the provincial Attorneys General were being consulted on the substance of the proposed amendment. Cabinet considered the draft on August 8, 1951, with the result that a decision was taken to proceed as a matter of normal diplomatic negotiation to discuss with the appropriate United States authorities the addition of the two offences in question to those covered by the Extradition Treaty. It is expected that the United States will now formally propose a draft convention along the lines of the text already approved by the departmental officials concerned in Ottawa.

3. I might add to the foregoing that the United States Embassy in Ottawa submitted, together with the draft, a draft note purporting to enclose the draft Convention in which the interpretation intended to be put upon the text of the new Articles in the Convention would be confirmed so that their meaning would correspond precisely to the meanings intended by the United States and Canadian officials who drafted the new Articles. The United States Embassy was informed that the additional draft note would be inappropriate because every effort had been made to define the new extraditable offences in terms which would cover the laws of both countries and the precise meaning of the words used would, upon the conclusion of the Convention, be a question for the Extradition Judge.

4. When the United States Embassy submitted the draft convention, an opportunity was taken to express once more that Canada was most anxious to have the short form registration procedure available to United States companies under the laws governing the operations of the S.E.C. extended to Canadian companies. The Embassy was informed that this question would be raised by the Canadian Embassy in Washington through the State Department. I think you have sufficient material upon which to base an approach to the State Department in this matter. If Mr. Matthews should happen to be in Toronto, it might be useful if he could discuss the matter with Mr. Lennox, Head of the Ontario Securities Commission, on an informal basis. Mr. Lennox disclosed in the course of discussions last May that he had gone to Washington and endeavoured to get the S.E.C. to extend the short form procedure to Canadian companies. Some first hand account from Mr. Lennox of these discussions with the S.E.C. might be of assistance in the approach to the State Department.

5. I attach for your records a copy of a letter† of today's date to the Deputy Minister of Justice which will bring you up-to-date on the action taking place at the present time in Ottawa.

EXTRADITION FOR SECURITY FRAUDS

1. Today, Mr. Matthews discussed with Mr. Haselton of the State Department and with Messrs. McEntyre and Kroll of SEC, the possibility of the Security and Exchange Commission authorizing the use of the short form of registration procedure by Canadian dealers, after the conclusion of the Extradition Agreement.

2. Mr. McEntyre said that the SEC had given careful and sympathetic consideration to the suggestion since the discussions in Ottawa last May. He was careful to point out that no final decision on the question has yet been taken but implied that he did expect that a satisfactory result could be obtained. The SEC did not believe that the regulations, which apply to the issuance of securities by United States security dealers, could be adopted for Canadian dealers without some amendment. The examples of the differences which he mentioned, were that all Canadian issues would have to be registered in Washington rather than in local offices of the SEC and also that owing to the time required for correspondence sale of the securities could not commence, without specific authorization, by SEC, for 10 days after registration rather than 5 days for domestic issues. He pointed out that frequently written authority might be granted in less than 10 days and also suggested that if after an experimental period less time was found to be necessary the period might be shortened. Mr. McEntyre went on to say that the form they are considering for use by Canadian dealers would require considerably less detail than that now given in the prospectus which has to be filed with the Ontario Securities Commission. He thought it might be possible to work out some plan under which the Ontario prospectus would be filed with SEC plus a supplementary sheet giving additional information such as the agent of the security issuer upon whom documents could be served in the United States and also containing the statement required on all SEC prospectuses that registration with SEC did not imply approval of the issue by SEC.

3. Mr. McEntyre then went on to point out that in the case of domestic security issuers using the short form procedure there were two sanctions:

(a) Prosecution for fraud (this was referred to in the Minutes of the Ottawa discussion) and

(b) The use of injunctions.

While the former would be available in the case of a Canadian security dealer after the ratification of the new agreement, the Security and Exchange Commission had been considerably worried as to what could replace their use of injunctions. They point out that a criminal prosecution is a slow and clumsy weapon and they are afraid that if that was all that was available, in spite of the Extradition Treaty, the efforts of fraudulent security dealers in Canada might merely be increased if short form procedure was available. Recently, however, they have seen press reports of a statement made by Mr. Lennox of the Ontario Security Commission before the Ontario Committee of Inquiry, which they thought might provide the answer to this problem. They informed me that Mr. Lennox is reported to have said that if the short form procedure was made available to Canadian security dealers there would be no excuse for Canadian dealers endeavouring to sell securities in the United States without complying with the United States registration requirements. Mr. Lennox then went on to say that in his opinion an effort to sell in the United States without registration might be justification for revoking the dealer's Ontario licence. Mr. McEntyre said that if an understanding could be reached between the SEC and the Ontario Securities Commission that the Ontario Securities Commission would adopt the practice suggested by Mr. Lennox, he thought all difficulty in introducing the short form procedure would vanish. He pointed out, however, that the more vigorous enforcement of the Ontario laws had recently shown signs of driving some of the dealers from Toronto to Montreal and therefore felt that a similar arrangement would be required with the Province of Quebec.

4. SEC expect to have completed their draft regulations that would apply to registration by Canadian dealers on the short form within ten days to two weeks. Mr. McEntyre said that he thought it would be useful before the draft was finally adopted if he had an opportunity to discuss it with both the Ontario and Quebec authorities and implied that SEC would have an open mind concerning any amendments that the Ontario or Quebec authorities might wish to suggest. He also would want at that time to discuss with the authorities of both provinces the possibility of their applying sanctions against security dealers who endeavoured to sell in the United States unregistered securities. He inquired whether there would be any objection to his making a direct approach to the provincial authorities to arrange for these discussions and pointed out that any arrangements between them would not be intergovernmental agreements but only agreements between regulatory authorities in both countries. Mr. Matthews agreed that such discussions would be desirable and that there would be no objection to the arrangements for a visit to Toronto and Quebec by Mr. McEntyre and Mr. Kroll being made outside diplomatic channels.

5. Mr. McEntyre raised the question of an exchange of notes at the time of the signature of the agreement. It was pointed out to Mr. McEntyre, in so far as the Canadian courts were concerned, the exchange of notes would have no effect whatsoever on the interpretation of the agreement. Mr. Matthews also said that in the opinion of Canadian officials the draft notes submitted by the United States Embassy in Ottawa, did correctly express the intention of those who took part in the Ottawa discussions and that the Ottawa officials were satisfied that that intention was correctly expressed in the draft agreement. Mr. Kroll pointed out that the position in the United States concerning the interpretation of treaties or statutes by a court was very different. He referred to a remark said to have been made by Mr. Justice Frankfurter on the bench of the Supreme Court, that now the United States courts were apt only to look at the text of a statute when the legislative history was obscure. Mr. McEntyre agreed, however, that in view of the Canadian practice of interpretating treaties the SEC would withdraw their request for an exchange of notes at the time of signature.

6. Mr. McEntyre believes that it would probably be possible to obtain senatorial approval of ratification if the agreement is signed not later than two weeks before the adjournment of Congress. He is going to make inquiries immediately in the appropriate senatorial committees and if he finds that ratification would be possible on short notice he will let us know and hopes that in that event, we will do everything possible to expedite consideration of the agreement in Canada.

7. For your information, I am enclosing one copy of a letter† from Mr. McEntyre to the Honourable Dana Porter, which letter was read into the record of the hearings of the Ontario Committee on the Administration of Justice.

YUKON RIVER POWER PROJECT

The Cabinet agenda for Thursday, March 1, includes a progress report on the work of the Canadian Section of the Joint Canadian-United States Economic Committee on the Yukon River Power Project. The Minister of Resources and Development recommends that the United States Government be informed that Canada is not prepared to take any further steps with respect to a joint investigation into this problem until we have explored further the possibility of using the waters concerned in Canada.

2. You will remember that when the proposal of a joint investigation was first considered, the Cabinet was not convinced that such a development would be favourable, on balance, to Canada, and agreed to a joint study only on the distinct understanding that this would involve no commitment as to further action.[122]

3. The British Columbia Government is anxious to have any further work on this study deferred. In addition, the report of the Canadian Section of the Joint Economic Committee does not suggest that this project would be of substantial advantage to Canada.

4. While this is not stated in Mr. Winter's memorandum, I understand Mr. Howe is opposed to further Canadian participation in this joint study, perhaps because of the difficulties that have arisen over the sale of Canadian aluminum to the United States Government.

5. The question may arise whether the results of the studies already made by the Canadian Section of the Joint Economic Committee should be made available to the United States Section if the Cabinet decides against Canadian participation in any further studies. In the exchange of notes which initiated this joint study the United States Note said inter alia "that the United States agrees to the joint study as contemplated by the draft instructions attached as Appendix B to the record of the meeting of November 21 and 22, 1949". The Appendix B referred to suggested that a study of the project's engineering feasibility and its economic implications should be initiated "on a cooperative and exchange basis" by the interested Departments of the two Governments. This understanding was not challenged in our reply to the United States Note. I think, therefore, that it was clearly understood on both sides that the studies would be made "on a cooperative and exchange basis", and that it would be somewhat difficult to refuse to the United States members the economic studies already made by the Canadian Section of the Joint Economic Committee. (I attach copies of the notes exchanged and of the Appendix which contained these words.)†

ing feasibility and economic implications of the Yukon River power diversion project had now been completed. The U.S. government had made similar investigations in Alaska. U.S. officials were pressing for joint consideration of the reports so that a decision could be made as to the next step. The government of British Columbia was anxious to have further work on the project deferred and there was a possibility that the water could be used to good advantage in Canada. There had been a clear understanding that, in undertaking the studies, Canada would in no way be committed to future action. It was recommended that no further steps be taken with respect to a joint investigation.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

YUKON RIVER PROJECT

Mr. Herbert of Resources and Development has just told me of a conversation he had with Mr. Willoughby when the latter received our Note on the Yukon River Project.

Willoughby told him it was his impression that the real meaning of the Canadian Government's decision was that nothing at all would be done with this water, even by Canada. Herbert said there was no reason to assume that; he added that, while he simply did not know whether Canada would use the water, there was no doubt that preliminary studies did in fact indicate a possibility of using the water in Canada. Funds have been included in the Resources and Development estimates for this investigation, which could be used to explore the feasibility of Canadian use of the water. He assured Willoughby that the mention of this in our Note as a reason for the Canadian decision to discontinue the joint study was not a red herring, although he agreed that it would be reasonable to suppose that the United States decision not to enter into a contract for aluminum from the new Kitimat plant might have influenced the decision.

Herbert is having lunch with Willoughby tomorrow and will show him, on the map, where it is thought a diversion of the water might be made in Canada.

TRUCKING IN BOND

844. DEA/48-FS-40

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au premier ministre de l'Ontario

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Premier of Ontario

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, April 16, 1951

Mr dear Premier:

TRANSIT TRUCKING IN BOND ACROSS SOUTHERN ONTARIO

On June 22nd, 1948, Mr. St. Laurent, then Secretary of State for External Affairs, wrote to the Honourable Colin Gibson, then Secretary of State, asking him to draw the attention of the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario to the desirability of altering certain regulations of the Ontario Government so as to permit transit trucking in bond across Southern Ontario. I understand that at that time your Government considered this question, but that the regulations were not altered so as to permit this traffic.

The interest of the Federal Government in the question of transit trucking in bond arises from two sources. Firstly, Canada is a contracting Party to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Article V of this Agreement (copy attached†) requires Contracting Parties to permit freedom of transit through their territories. The fact that the provisions of this article have not been fulfilled has presented some difficulties for the Federal Government. Secondly, as pointed out by the United States authorities, Canadian trucks from all provinces have transit privileges through United States territory, even though some provinces have not granted reciprocal rights. An example of this traffic is the transport by Canadian trucking companies of automobiles manufactured in Ontario to markets in Western Canada. It has been reported that the monthly average number of trucks engaging in this traffic alone very nearly equals the monthly average number of United States trucks which engaged in the transport of goods in bond across Southern Ontario during the war. This represents a substantial change in the trucking situation from that which existed in the pre-war period. It is reasonable to assume that the freedom of operation which Canadian trucks now enjoy in the United States will not be continued indefinitely if we are not prepared to grant United States trucks reciprocal privileges in Canada.

The question of transit trucking through Southern Ontario is of considerable importance to United States trucking firms as the use of the Canadian route would save a substantial amount of driving time. For example, traffic moving between Detroit and Buffalo via the 261 mile route through the Niagara Peninsula saves 104 miles or 6 hours driving time.

Recently, the United States Embassy approached us again and asked that we take the matter up once more with the Ontario Government. We are also informed that the Canadian section of the Joint Canada-United States Chambers of Commerce Committee is intending to request an interview with you during this month to urge that the provincial regulations be altered to permit transit trucking.

In the past objections to trucking in bond across Southern Ontario have been raised primarily by the United States and Canadian railway companies and by the Railway Brotherhood. It appears, however, that the bulk of the bonded freight through Southern Ontario is carried by United States railways, and consequently the interest of the Canadian railways in the transit trucking issue is relatively small. The real dispute seems to lie between the United States trucking companies and the United States railways.

The United States Government has expressed a strong interest in the solution to the trucking in bond issue. Besides creating difficulties between the United States and Canadian Governments, the fact that the terms of Article V of GATT have not been implemented tends to interfere from time to time when we are seeking the assistance of the United States Government on various matters — including matters in which the Ontario Government has an interest.

In view of all these considerations, I should be grateful if your Government would review its previous decision on this question and give favourable consideration to altering present regulations and practices so as to permit transit trucking.

We should also welcome any information on the Ontario Government's views on transit trucking and would greatly appreciate being kept informed of future developments.

Yours sincerely,
L.B. PEARSON

CONFIDENTIAL Toronto, April 19, 1951

Dear Mr. Pearson:

I have for acknowledgment your letter date-lined April, 1951, concerning transit trucking in bond across Southern Ontario. The Honourable Mr. Doucett, the Minister of Highways, is away and I shall discuss the matter with him on his return.

One of the very important factors in this matter which probably has not been given consideration by you is our traffic problem. For some eleven years now we have been in very abnormal conditions. True, a large portion of that time building materials were not available and once again we are in a period of very severe restriction. The result is that our road building program is very much in arrears. In the meantime our motor car registration has risen and is now considerably in excess of a million registrations. One of our very pressing problems is a two-lane highway from Windsor through to Hamilton and the Niagara Peninsula. This year we are only able to make a very small commencement on this road, and in the meantime the traffic conditions on the highways leading from the Windsor area to the Niagara Peninsula and Toronto are over-crowded.

In addition to that we have to take care of tourist cars entering from the United States which now very greatly exceed our total registration in Ontario. This will give you one substantial reason why we are hesitant to do anything which would further complicate our problem.

It is, of course, quite true that during the war days traffic was permitted on Highway number 3, and many thousands of American trucks availed themselves of this privilege. I may say that very considerable damage occurred to the road, which in fact we have not been able to catch up with. The cost of repairs and replacement of some of our roads is just as expensive under present conditions as it used to be to build an entirely new road. I point out, however, that during the war days due to gasoline, tire and other restrictions the traffic in the Province was very much limited. This does not apply under present conditions where we have had a vast increase in motor traffic without a corresponding extension of our road system.

I shall be glad indeed to discuss the matter with Mr. Doucett upon his return. In the meantime, however, I thought it best to tell you about the above situation.

Very sincerely yours,

LESLIE M. FROST

action, without consulting his Department. He spoke in terms of very considerable annoyance. I managed to get the facts at once and to prove to him that we had, in fact, sent his Department a copy of the draft letter to Mr. Frost before it was sent to Toronto, and had waited two weeks for the comments of his Department. He apologized for his misunderstanding of the facts, but still feels that it was unfortunate that the letter went without a further effort to hasten the reply from his Department.

2. I believe there is some feeling among those concerned here that we are under no particular obligation to consult Transport in this matter. I think that this is a mistake and that we should keep in very close touch with them concerning it, difficult though, at times, that may be.[124]

Dear Lionel [Chevrier],

I am returning herewith the memorandum† from your Deputy concerning trucking in bond across Southern Ontario.

I agree that when our Department asked your Deputy to ascertain the comments of the Canadian National Railways on this subject, we should have delayed sending the letter to Premier Frost or should have at least let you know that we found ourselves unable to hold it up any longer. I apologize for that.

Incidentally, I perhaps should tell you that my Department was under heavy pressure from within and without Canada to renew our request to the Government of Ontario to reconsider the matter. This pressure included personal visits to Ottawa of the Canadian solicitors acting for the various trucking associations, representations from individuals on behalf of various interests in Southwestern Ontario, requests for action by the United States Government under our obligation in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to permit trucking in bond across Canada and by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce who were proposing to send a delegation to see Premier Frost and who hoped that our letter could precede their visit. In addition, our friend Paul Martin became concerned when the State of Michigan refused to permit Canadian trucks proceeding from Windsor to Western Canada to

DESPATCH E-2994 Ottawa, September 28, 1951

TRUCKING IN BOND ACROSS SOUTHERN ONTARIO

Willoughby raised this matter with Plumptre again yesterday. (We have been receiving informal representations regarding it every few weeks). Willoughby seemed to hope that this Department would take some new initiative vis-à-vis the Government of Ontario. Plumptre told him pretty straight that he did not think Ministers would be willing to take any further action, at any rate until there was some significant change in the circumstances. Mr. Pearson had written to Mr. Frost in the Spring and followed it up more recently with a reminder.† No further action could be anticipated at this time.

2. Willoughby said that he was expecting to attend a Highways Convention in the United States (Boston) in about a fortnight. While most of the Convention would be occupied with rather technical matters, he anticipated that trucking in bond would come up; indeed this was the reason for his invitation. He was afraid that some of the States might take retaliatory action against Canada and deny to Canadian carriers the use of United States roads and other facilities.

3. When pressed to be specific as to what he feared, it emerged that he did not really expect very much to happen. He himself pointed out that the vast majority of States had no particular interest in the matter.

4. Plumptre pointed out that, since the Canadian Government has gone as far as it was likely to go at this time, any additional pressure would have to be levelled directly at the Government of Ontario. He suggested that a representative of the Ontario Department of Highways might possibly be invited to attend the Convention but Mr. Willoughby did not seem to think that there would be anybody at the Convention who would really be in a position to bring any pressure on the Ontario Government.

5. Willoughby asked whether the Canadian Government would simply stand by if there was a real threat of retaliation. Plumptre replied that he could not anticipate what action Ministers would in fact take in a given set of circumstances. However, if the Department of State officially informed the Canadian Government that specific retaliation was imminent, and that certain States were about to take certain actions, he thought it likely that Ministers would wish to pass this information on to the Government of Ontario.

BEER, WINE AND SPIRITS — IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES

I attach a self-explanatory despatch to Washington on this subject. I was glad to be able to assure Mr. Willoughby and his colleague, Mr. Habib, that you would pursue the matter with them when you come back to Ottawa. They are under some pressure from Washington and would be grateful to be able to see you as soon as possible. I would be glad if either I or an officer of my Division could be present when you speak to them.

2. It does seem clear that the Liquor Control Boards are exercising some discrimination against United States imports, at any rate of wines, and probably of beers also. Since the Federal Government gave them a lead in this direction some years ago it would seem desirable at this time to let them know that, as far as the Federal Government is concerned, there is no continuing justification for discrimination. Indeed I think it might well be brought to the attention of these Boards that under GATT it is the policy of the Dominion Government that purchases should be made on a commercial basis rather than a protectionist basis.

3. I am sending copies of this letter and the attached despatch to the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Finance.

DESPATCH E-2294 Ottawa, June 15, 1951

BEER, WINE AND SPIRITS — IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES

Officials of the United States Embassy have approached this Department alleging discrimination amongst the Provincial Liquor Boards against importation of beer, wine and spirits from the United States.

2. After a preliminary consultation with the Department of National Revenue it was explained to the United States officials that, during the period of acute U.S. dollar shortage in 1947-8, there had been an informal approach from the Federal authorities to the Provincial Liquor Boards suggesting some economy in purchases of American wines. However, there had been no approach to them since that time and at no time had there been any approach regarding imports of beer and spirits. Hence at the present time the Liquor Boards were entirely free to purchase from the United States although it was admitted that there was probably some carry-over up to the present of the discriminatory attitude on wines which had been suggested some years ago.

3. The United States officials recalled that they had raised the matter with us some three years ago but, because Canadian exchange difficulties were serious at that time, they had been willing not to pursue it. However, there were no exchange difficulties at present and all official restrictions had been taken off. The discrimination was apparently continuing. The United States Consuls had been in touch with the Liquor Boards in Ontario and British Columbia and had gathered that the discrimination seemed to be a matter of informal agreement amongst the Liquor Boards and was based to a considerable extent on a deliberate attempt to protect Canadian breweries and wineries. There was a continual pressure on the United States authorities in Washington to attempt to get this discrimination removed, a pressure which was particularly heavy at the present when there seemed to be no justification for it in the Canadian dollar position.

4. The United States officials were told that some Provincial Liquor Boards had in the past imported United States spirits and offered them for sale but had found little or no market for them. Since the four largest United States distillers were also operating in Canada it was scarcely to be expected that there would be much importation of spirits from the United States. The United States officials agreed, saying that their worries were chiefly, if not exclusively, in the fields of beer and wine.

5. As for beer, they did not anticipate any substantial imports into Canada from the United States under any circumstances. What rankled in the minds of United States producers and dealers was the fact that they were completely excluded and were given no opportunity to compete.

6. In the field of wines the United States officials stated that, even when American wines were imported into Canada (as they had been in substantial quantities at certain times in the past), they were not handled equitably by Canadian Liquor Commissions. Although their cost to the Commissions was relatively low they were priced with French wines rather than to compete with Canadian domestic wines. They referred to some recent agitation in the Province of British Columbia for the import of American wines.

7. The Deputy Minister of National Revenue (Customs and Excise) is away from Ottawa at present but has undertaken to discuss the matter further with the United States officials when he returns.

Dear Sir,

RE BEER, WINE AND SPIRITS — IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES

I have read with interest your letter of June 15th, with enclosed despatch on this subject.

It must be borne in mind that the retailing of intoxicating liquors is a matter coming solely within the purview of the Provinces and I feel that we would only be inviting a rebuff from at least some of them if we undertook to formally question them in this regard.

I am aware that they have an informal understanding among themselves that they will not purchase wines in the United States but I have no knowledge of any similar arrangement in regard to spirits or beer. As far as these two commodities are concerned, I am inclined to the opinion that there is little or no practical demand from consumers. The most important distillers in the United States have related companies in Canada and while there is a substantial movement of bulk spirits across the border in both directions, principally for blending purposes, the trade would seem to have little interest in pushing the sale of spirits bottled in the United States.

The few Provinces which have from time to time stocked United States spirits seem to have found that the goods remained on the shelves and this is understandable because a tourist coming to Canada is inclined to look for Canadian whisky which, I am advised, has achieved an enviable reputation. The same consumer preference is apparently found in connection with beer. Canadians seem to be relatively well satisfied with the product produced here and incoming Americans seem to regard it as one of the amenities which they look for on this side of the border.

The situation I think is not quite the same in regard to wine. California, in particular, seems to produce some types which, notwithstanding the tariff, could compete with our domestic vintages, but as a consequence of the informal arrangement among the Provincial Liquor Commissioners, little or no wine is imported from the United States except, possibly, some for sacramental purposes.

The Commissioners were encouraged in this arrangement some years ago by ourselves when Canada was facing a serious dollar shortage. Indeed, I recall participating in some discussions in this regard at one of the annual conferences of Liquor Commissioners held prior to 1948. At subsequent conferences, I have been careful to tell the Liquor Commissioners that there was no longer any Federal interest in their restraining their purchases because of currency considerations and there is, of course, no Federal prohibition on importation.

I think, perhaps, to meet the request now made to your Department by Mr. Woodbury Willoughby, Economic Counsellor of the United States Embassy, that it would be more appropriate if, instead of communicating in a formal way with the Provinces, we undertook to speak to them about this matter at the next conference of Liquor Commissioners which I understand will be held some time in September. There can, of course, be no assurance that they will change their policy because, after all, it is a matter upon which the final decision must rest with them, but I would hope to make it clear that insofar as the Federal Government is concerned, we must have regard to our obligations under GATT and are therefore impelled to ask them to consider the importation of wine from the United States on a purely commercial basis without regard to any domestic considerations.

Yours faithfully,

DAVID SIM

IMPORTATION OF BEER, WINE AND SPIRITS FROM THE UNITED STATES

On June 15th Willoughby of the United States Embassy approached this Division on the above-mentioned subject, alleging discrimination amongst Provincial Liquor Control Boards against the importation of beer, wine and spirits from the United States. We took the matter up with Mr. Sim of National Revenue, and he subsequently had several conversations with Mr. Willoughby. Sim told Willoughby that he would take the matter up at the next meeting of the Provincial Liquor Commissioners in September.

2. Willoughby did not wish to let the matter rest, however, as the State Department is under some current pressure from United States exporters and he wishes to be able to show some concrete evidence of the action he has taken. Accordingly, he prepared a draft note† (on top of the attached file) in rather strong terms, written with a view to circulation to interested United States Congressmen and exporters. In his conversations with us he has also expressed the hope that we might find it possible to send letters to the Provincial L.C.B.s requesting them to cease discriminating against United States products.

3. I do not think we should encourage Willoughby to send this note, or even a more conciliatory draft.[125] A formal approach, particularly of this nature, is not likely to help the Government to meet the United States request and might serve merely to encourage the United States exporters and create further hard feeling if the Provincial Boards do not increase their purchases in the United States. It is not in order, I think, at this stage to send letters to the Provincial Boards.

4. We have talked this over with Sim and he agrees completely. I attach a letter from him of July 4th, setting out the present situation and recommending that, instead of communicating in a formal way with the Provinces, we (i.e., Sim) undertake to speak to the Provincial Commissioners about this matter at their next meeting. Sim feels that this sort of approach may bring results in at least some of the Provinces.

5. If you agree with this suggestion, perhaps you would like to call Willoughby in and pass on our views to him.

IMPORTATION OF BEER, WINE AND SPIRITS FROM THE UNITED STATES

After talking to Mr. Moran, Mr. Willoughby has decided not to send the draft note to which reference is made in our memorandum of July 10th to the Under-Secretary. He has agreed to rely on the informal approaches he has made and Sim's assurance that he will take the whole matter up with the Provincial Liquor Commissioners at their next annual meeting in September.

Willoughby asked to have his draft note returned to him. The following are the main points in his note:

American producers have been given to understand that for some time Canadian Provincial Liquor Control Boards have, by "gentlemen's agreement", limited the distribution in Canada of U.S. alcoholic beverages. Whether limitations on imports are achieved by this method or by other means, it is clear that such imports from the United States have been substantially less than might be expected if restrictions were not in effect. In 1950, for example, U.S. exports of beer, ale, porter and stout to Canada were valued at only $98. and U.S. export of wines at only $47,732. Although U.S. exports of whisky to Canada in that year were valued at $2,315,642., it is understood that such purchases are chiefly in bulk and used for blending with Canadian whisky, much of which is shipped to the United States.

On the other hand, U.S. imports of alcoholic beverages from Canada have been substantial and are increasing. In 1950, purchases of Canadian whisky totalled $33,491,941. and purchases of Canadian beer, ale, porter and stout totalled $1,638,142. Moreover, at Geneva in 1947 and at Torquay in 1951, the U.S. granted Canada valuable tariff concessions on alcoholic beverages which benefitted, and will no doubt further benefit, Canadian exporters of these products to the U.S.

On the basis of their own investigations of the Canadian market, American producers of alcoholic beverages have satisfied themselves that there is a demand for their products in Canada. As a result, a number of requests have been received from these producers for assistance in persuading provincial authorities to alter their restrictive policies. In seeking the assistance of the U.S. Government, these producers have pointed out that the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade contains provisions pertinent to the situation, referring in particular to those provisions relative to the operations of state-trading enterprises (Article XVII), most-favored-nation treatment, and observance of the Agreement by regional and local governments (Article XXIV). They have also emphasized that these restrictions reduce or eliminate, insofar as the United States is concerned, the value of the concessions granted by Canada at Geneva and continued at Torquay, on several types of alcoholic beverages, covered by Canadian tariff items, 146, 147, ex-156, ex-163 and 165.

[126] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I will speak to him along lines of this memo & Mr. Sim's letter. H.M[oran]

In the circumstances it has become increasingly difficult for the U.S. Government to give American producers of alcoholic beverages an explanation for their inability to sell their products in Canada which the latter can accept as reasonable or justified. As a result there has been developed an amount of irritation which is out of proportion to the advantages which are presumably obtained by Canadian producers through the protection afforded by these limitations on imports.

Dear Mr. Willoughby:

I refer to previous discussions which you have had with this Department concerning the importation by the Provincial Liquor Control Boards of beer, wine and spirits and the reports which you draw to our attention of alleged discrimination against such imports from the United States.

I am now glad to report that Mr. David Sim, Deputy Minister of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, brought this matter up at the annual conference of the Provincial Liquor Commissioners last August. Mr. Sim drew the Conference's attention to representations you had made to us and pointed out that there was no reason for restricting purchases of beer, wine and spirits from the United States as United States dollars are freely available for this purpose. Furthermore, he pointed out that Canada is obliged under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to eliminate any restrictions other than duties and taxes on the importation of products from another Contracting Party, and urged the Provincial Liquor Commissioners to make their purchases on a purely commercial basis.

The Conference passed a resolution on this subject which, while leaving the matter of implementation in the hands of the individual Commissions, is in conformity with the points made by Mr. Sim.

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO THE INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION ON THE LAKE OF THE WOODS WATERSHED

In November 1950, the United States Government proposed that a joint reference be made to the International Joint Commission calling for a full investigation of the present methods of the regulation of the Lake of the Woods and its watershed.

The Commission has investigated most of this watershed pursuant to two previous references, one on the Lake of the Woods in 1912, and another on the Rainy Lake area in 1925.[127] Both investigations resulted in the conclusion of conventions between Canada and the United States, the Lake of the Woods Convention of 1925, and the Rainy Lake Convention of 1938.[128] The methods of regulation established by these conventions worked satisfactorily until 1950, when an extensive flood occurred despite every effort to prevent it. It was this flood which led to the United States proposal of a new investigation.

The United States proposal was discussed at a meeting of officials of the Governments of Canada, Ontario and Manitoba. The provincial representatives indicated that they would prefer not to have this subject re-opened. If, however, Canada could not refuse to agree to a reference, they considered that the terms of reference suggested by the United States would not be satisfactory. If a reference were to result in such a change in the method of regulation as would reduce the volume of water storage in the Lake of the Woods, hydro-electric power production in both provinces would suffer.

As a result of this meeting a reply was sent to the United States Embassy asking for information about the nature and extent of the damage caused in the United States by the 1950 flood. It was thought that if the damage was found to be not very extensive it would then be possible to point out to the United States Government that the cost of an investigation would not be justified in comparison with the amount of damage suffered. In reply, however, the United States Government said that the determination of the nature and extent of the damage would be a matter for the Commission, and repeated its request for a joint reference.

If we were to refuse to agree to a joint reference the United States, under the provisions of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909,[129] could refer the matter to the Commission without our consent. The investigation would then be based on the terms of reference proposed by the United States, which are prejudicial to the important Canadian interests involved. (The United States draft is attached as Appendix A.)

For this reason, a revised draft of terms of reference has been prepared by the interested Canadian Government departments. This draft has been sent to the two provinces and we have been informed that it is satisfactory from their point of view. It begins by asking the Commission whether the existing arrangements are adequate. Only if they are inadequate is the Commission to make an investigation. If an investigation is made, the Commission is to bear in mind "the necessity of preserving the storage ranges" provided for by the present arrangement. (This draft is attached as Appendix B.)

I recommend that the Canadian Government agree to a joint reference to the Commission on the basis of the draft terms of reference in Appendix B.[130]

September ____, 1950

DRAFT REFERENCE PROPOSED BY THE UNITED STATES

In view of the damage caused in the Lake of the Woods watershed by the flood of 1950, and in order to determine whether it is practicable and desirable from the viewpoints of the Governments of Canada and the United States of America to devise and carry into effect an improved plan of regulation and utilization of the waters of the Lake of the Woods watershed in the Provinces of Ontario and Manitoba and in the State of Minnesota, the Governments of Canada and the United States of America have agreed to refer the matter to the International Joint Commission for investigation and report, together with conclusions and recommendations, pursuant to Article IX of the Treaty between the United States of America and Great Britain in respect to Canada, signed at Washington on the 11th day of January, 1909, relating to Boundary Waters.

2. It is desired that the Commission, after reviewing the plans of regulation put into effect pursuant to the Convention between Canada and the United States of America, signed at Washington February 24, 1925, relating to regulation of the level of Lake of the Woods, and the Convention between the United States and Canada signed at Ottawa September 15, 1938, relating to emergency regulation of the level of Rainy Lake and of other boundary waters in the Rainy Lake watershed, shall determine whether, in its judgment, considering the Lake of the Woods and its entire watershed, and more particularly the various lakes in the watershed and their inlets and outlets, it would be feasible and desirable to devise and carry into effect a better general plan of regulation of these waters, their inflow and outflow channels, and utilization of the water resources, of the Lake of the Woods watershed as a whole having in mind existing and future requirements for (A) domestic water supply and sanitation, (B) navigation, (C) the control of floods throughout the basin for the protection of properties along the shores of the various lakes and their connecting waters, including agricultural lands and other properties adversely affected by high lake levels, (D) efficient development of water power, (E) reclamation of wet lands, (F) conservation of fish and wildlife, (G) recreation, and (H) other beneficial purposes.

3. In the event that the Commission should find that further works, projects or measures to effect better control and regulation and more extensive utilization of the waters of the Lake of the Woods watershed are desirable, it should indicate how the interests on either side of the international boundary would be benefited or adversely affected thereby, and should estimate the costs of such works, projects or measures including indemnification for damage to public or private property and the costs of remedial works, projects or measures that may be found to be justified, and should indicate how the costs of any such works, projects or measures and the amounts of any resulting damage may equitably be apportioned among interests on either side of the boundary or between the two Governments.

4. The Commission should include in its report a review of all prior investigations and reports relating to the Lake of the Woods watershed or parts thereof made under authority of the Governments of the United States and Canada. It is desired further that the Commission's report pursuant to this Reference contain information on the history and present status of existing dams, water power plants, navigation works, and other properties, whether publicly or privately owned, located within the Lake of the Woods watershed insofar as such information may be germane to the subject under consideration.

5. In the conduct of its investigations and otherwise in the performance of its duties under this Reference, the Commission may utilize the services of engineers and other specially qualified personnel of the technical agencies of Canada and the United States and will so far as possible make use of information and technical data heretofore acquired by such technical agencies or which may become available during the course of the investigation, thus avoiding duplication of effort and unnecessary expense.

Appendix B

DRAFT LAKE OF THE WOODS REFERENCE

In view of the excessive run-off and the resultant high water levels experienced during 1950 in that portion of the Lake of the Woods watershed the regulation of which is provided for in the Convention between Canada and the United States of America signed at Washington on February 24, 1925, and the Convention between the United States and Canada signed at Ottawa, September 15, 1938, and the subsequent Order of the International Joint Commission of June 8, 1949, the Governments of the United States and Canada have agreed, in accordance with Article IX of the Boundary Waters Treaty of January 11, 1909, to request the International Joint Commission:

(1) to indicate whether the Lake of the Woods Convention of 1925 and the Order of the International Joint Commission of June 8, 1949, pertaining to Rainy and Namakan Lakes, adequately provide for a contingency such as arose in 1950;

(2) if the answer to (1) is negative, to review the plans for regulation put into effect pursuant to the above-mentioned Conventions, and to consider what, if any, other methods of regulation might provide better protection to foreshore interests, bearing in mind,

(a) the necessity of preserving the storage ranges provided in the Convention of 1925 and the Order of the International Joint Commission of June 8, 1949; and

(b) the desirability of protecting all interests against excessively low lake levels;

(3) to indicate whether any of the methods considered under (2) are, in the Commission's judgement, economically justifiable, bearing in mind,

(a) the alternative possibility of adjusting the flowage easement provided for in the Convention of 1925; and

(b) the extent of any damage which may have been suffered by the inhabitants of Canada and the United States as a result of high water levels during the period of regulation under the Convention of 1925 and the Order of the International Joint Commission of June 8, 1949;

(4) to indicate, should a new method or methods of regulation be considered to be economically justifiable,

(a) what further works, projects or methods for control and regulation of the waters under reference are required;

(b) how the interests on either side of the international boundary would be benefitted or adversely affected thereby;

(c) the estimated cost of such projects or measures including indemnification for damage to public or private property and the cost of necessary remedial works;

(d) how the cost of any such works and the amounts of any resulting damage may equitably be apportioned between the two Governments;

(5) to indicate, should a new method of regulation not be considered to be economically justifiable, whether an adjustment of the existing flowage easement provided by the Convention of 1925 is, in the judgement of the Commission, feasible and economically justifiable;

(6) if an adjustment of the flowage easement is considered to be feasible and economically justifiable, to indicate,

(a) the level to which the existing flowage easement might be adjusted;

(b) how the interests on either side of the international boundary would be benefitted or adversely affected thereby;

(c) the estimated cost of such an adjustment;

(d) how this cost may be equitably apportioned between the two Governments.

In the conduct of its investigations, and otherwise in the performance of its duties under this Reference, the International Joint Commission may utilize the services of engineers and other specially qualified personnel of technical agencies of Canada and the United States, and will so far as possible, make use of information and technical data which has been acquired by such technical agencies or which may become available during the course of the investigation, thus avoiding duplication of effort and unnecessary expense.

POLLUTION OF BOUNDARY WATERS

On April 1, 1946, the Governments of Canada and the United States requested the International Joint Commission to investigate the question of the pollution of the waters of the St. Clair River, Lake St. Clair and the Detroit River and to recommend remedial measures.[131] The reference was subsequently extended to cover the St. Mary's River between Lake Superior and Lake Huron and also the Niagara River.[132]

2. In its report to the two Governments on October 11, 1950, the Commission stated that treatment of municipal and industrial wastes is urgently needed in the areas under reference and that the capital cost of the required treatment works will be approximately $30,000,000 in Canada and approximately $100,000,000 in the United States. The Commission has recommended that:

(a) the "Objectives for Boundary Waters Quality Control" set out in its report, be adopted by the two Governments as the criteria for maintaining boundary waters in satisfactory condition;

(b) those responsible for pollution be called upon to maintain the recommended quality objectives;

(c) continued supervision be provided through international boards of control working in conjunction with the appropriate authorities in each country.

3. On December 21, 1950, the Government of the United States informed the Government of Canada that it approves the recommendations of the International Joint Commission. In order to implement the Commission's recommendations, it suggested that the two Governments simultaneously authorize the Commission to establish and maintain continuing supervision over pollution of boundary waters through boards of control, appointed by the Commission. These boards would notify those responsible for contravention of the "Objectives" set out by the Commission and, in the event that assurance were not given, that the pollution would be corrected within a reasonable time, recommendations would be made to the appropriate authorities as to the further action deemed advisable.

4. The implementation, at the Federal level, of the International Joint Commission's recommendations will substantially devolve upon the Department of National Health and Welfare. In view of the deep interest shown in this reference by the Government of the Province of Ontario, and because of its participation in investigations that have been made, the Department of National Health and Welfare propose to seek the close co-operation of the Ontario authorities including their participation in the supervisory activities of the proposed boards of control. To the extent that the supervising authorities will require to rely on legislation for the enforcement of the recommendations of the International Joint Commission herein, it is proposed to utilize substantially the regulations under the Public Health Act of the Province of Ontario as existing Federal legislation is not considered appropriate to the situation. In the event that the existing Provincial legislation is found to be inadequate, the situation will need to be further considered.

5. Considerable progress has already been made, on a voluntary basis, both in Canada and the United States, towards alleviating the conditions which were found to exist by the Commission during its investigation.

6. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, with the concurrence of the Ministers of National Health and Welfare, Public Works and Transport therefore recommends:

(i) that the Government approve the recommendations of the International Joint Commission;

(ii) that the Government agree to the United States Government's suggestion that the two Governments simultaneously authorize the Commission to establish and maintain continuing supervision over pollution of boundary waters;

(iii) that the Government of the United States be informed accordingly.

RE POLLUTION OF BOUNDARY WATERS

Mr. Pelletier of the Privy Council Office informed me that Cabinet has postponed a decision on the memorandum put to it on the above subject. Apparently Cabinet unanimously agreed that the general recommendation to clear up pollution was a good thing, but some doubted whether it was desirable at this stage when the Government is anxious to roll back capital expenditure that municipalities and private industries should be encouraged to embark on extensive capital investments to curb pollution. It seems that the government would like to have a further report outlining in some detail the actual cost involved and who should bear the cost of the programme. I gather that Cabinet was a little concerned that the municipalities or provincial government or possibly the larger industries might press the federal authorities for financial assistance at some later stage. Mr. Chevrier wanted the International Joint Commission to do this study for the whole Great Lakes system. He mentioned this some time ago to the Department and apparently reiterated this wish during the Cabinet discussion. I feel that the Department of National Health and Welfare should supply this additional information to the Cabinet but they will probably have to go to the Commission for the necessary information.

POLLUTION OF BOUNDARY WATERS

At its meeting of June 7, 1951, Cabinet noted the recommendations contained in the attached memorandum of May 30, marked Annex A, concerning the report of the International Joint Commission with respect to the pollution of certain boundary waters. A decision was deferred pending submission of a report on the relative importance of the various remedial measures recommended and on the detailed costs involved.

2. The required supplementary report comprises Annex B† of this memorandum.

3. On June 20, the United States Embassy in Ottawa enquired concerning the present position of this report of the International Joint Commission. The Embassy was informed that the matter is under active consideration.

4. By virtue of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, Canada is under an obligation to prevent the pollution of boundary waters. In view of the fact, therefore, that the Canadian Government joined with the United States Government in submitting this reference to the International Joint Commission, and since the United States Government has already accepted the report, it would be most embarrassing if the Government were unable to accept the Commission's recommendations.

5. The failure to accept the report would be all the more embarrassing in the event that the United States authorities undertook to implement the Commission's recommendations unilaterally on the United States side of the boundary. Continued pollution on the Canadian side of the boundary could not be restricted to Canadian waters. This would give rise to serious differences between the two countries. While some private Canadian companies have already undertaken remedial measures as a result of this reference, these measures might well be discontinued if the recommendations of the Commission were not accepted by the Government.

6. Additionally, there is the important consideration of the health of Canadian citizens in the areas contiguous to the waters under reference. The attached supplementary report specifies, as did the report of the International Joint Commission, that both industrial and municipal wastes in the waters under reference constitute a constant hazard to public health.

7. The Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, with the concurrence of the Ministers of National Health and Welfare, Public Works, and Transport, therefore recommends that the recommendations set out in the attached memorandum of May 30, be approved.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION; POLLUTION OF BOUNDARY WATERS

40. The Secretary of State for External Affairs recalled that, at the meeting of June 7th, 1951, consideration had been given to recommendations of the International Joint Commission respecting pollution of boundary waters from the St. Mary's River to the Niagara River but decision had been deferred pending submission of a report on the relative importance of the various remedial measures recommended and on the costs involved.

This report was now submitted for consideration. There was embarrassment in further postponing a decision in the matter since Canada had joined with the United States in 1946 in referring the question to the International Joint Commission; the U.S. government had approved the Commission's recommendations in 1950 and was pressing for information on the decision of the Canadian government. Under the Boundary Waters Treaty Canada was obliged to prevent pollution and, if the United States implemented the Commission's recommendations unilaterally, continued pollution on the Canadian side could not be restricted to Canadian waters and would give rise to serious differences with the United States, in fact some private companies had already undertaken remedial measures. Further, the pollution constituted a constant hazard to public health.

To implement the Commission's recommendations, the Department of National Health and Welfare would seek the co-operation of the Ontario authorities, including their participation in the supervisory activities of the international boards of control proposed. These would notify those responsible for contravention of the "Objectives" suggested in the Commission's report.

Originally, his proposals in the matter had been supported by the Ministers of National Health and Welfare, Public Works and Transport, and Cabinet had indicated that it was generally in favour. Recently Mr. Martin had again indicated his support of these proposals although he had asked that they be referred to Cabinet for further discussion and guidance. In the circumstances, he suggested that, if agreeable, Mr. Martin now be informed that Cabinet considered it desirable to approve these proposals.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Oct. 4, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 264-51)[135]

41. The Prime Minister remarked that the federal government might be asked to contribute to remedial measures if it approved the Commission's recommendations but felt that such approval was unavoidable in view of the provisions of the Boundary Waters Treaty.

42. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and agreed that the Minister of National Health and Welfare be informed that, unless he considered it necessary to have the matter discussed further, approval be given to:

(1) the recommendations of the International Joint Commission regarding control of pollution of boundary waters between the St. Mary's River and the Niagara River;

(2) the U.S. suggestion that the two governments simultaneously authorize the Commission to establish and maintain supervision over pollution of boundary waters; and,

(3) the U.S. government being informed of these decisions.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION; POLLUTION OF BOUNDARY WATERS

1. The Minister of National Health and Welfare referred to discussion at the meeting of October 5th, 1951, at which he was unable to be present, about control of pollution in boundary waters between the St. Mary's River and the Niagara River. He agreed it was essential to approve the recommendations of the International Joint Commission in the matter and believed that industry would carry out its share of the required remedial measures. He thought, however, that it should be recognized from the outset that when, in due course, the Ontario health authorities pressed the municipalities in the areas of the Detroit and St. Clair rivers to under-

The Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Transport have concurred that the recommendations set out in the memorandum to Cabinet dated May 30, 1951, be approved. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has expressed the view that there can be no doubt as to the desirability of taking steps to improve the quality of the water of the rivers and lakes in question, and he believes we should support the principles of the International Joint Commission report on the pollution of boundary waters. He has requested, however, that the matter should be referred again to Cabinet for discussion and guidance as to the policy to be adopted.

take remedial measures, it would be found that these municipalities could not assume all the costs involved and would request assistance.

2. The Prime Minister remarked that a time might come when the federal government would feel it desirable to make some contribution, with the Ontario government, to such remedial measures.

3. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted:

(a) the concurrence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare in the decisions taken at the meeting of October 5th, 1951, on control of pollution in boundary waters between the St. Mary's River and the Niagara River; and,

(b) that municipalities in the areas of the St. Clair and Detroit Rivers might in due course ask for financial assistance to enable them to carry out the remedial measures for which they would be responsible.

OEEC MINISTERIAL COUNCIL MEETINGS—MARCH 9 AND 10

1. We expressed the view in our telegram No. 34 of March 13 that nothing new or important came out of the last Ministerial Council meetings.

2. The Council accepted the invitation for the representation of O.E.E.C. on the Washington International Materials Conference and passed a number of Decisions and Recommendations (texts attached)†. It postponed consideration of the German crisis (pending further study), of the liberalization of trade (on the basis of a common list on which agreement has not yet been reached) and of the relationship between O.E.E.C. and the Council of Europe (pending further consideration by Member governments).

3. The deepening problems arising out of raw material shortages, inflation and controls continue to be the main concern of the Organization: they took up most of the time of the meeting. These problems have again been wrapped up in Decisions and Recommendations in which O.E.E.C. Members restate collectively the dangers, the principles and the objectives which have formed the basis of similar "action" since last fall. It is difficult to see what concrete results may emerge but it is fair to say that the reputation of the Organization has not been enhanced as a result of the Ministerial meeting.

4. This may be an overly negative appraisal of the meeting. The problems it wrestled with are world-wide and beyond the control of the Organization. They extend to fields in which a multilateral approach has, for practical reasons, rather strict limitations, and in which results must depend, in the last analysis, on measures actually applied by individual countries. It may be that little is lost by restating the broad objectives and plans although the danger exists that Member countries may hide behind these broad restatements in a sense of "action" which remains so far unproductive.[1]

Dear Lou [Couillard]:

I am seeing your familiar signature on an increasing number of despatches these days. Among the very best we have received is your letter No. 125 of March 14th in which you report on the O.E.E.C. Ministerial Council meetings of March 9th and 10th.

2. I get the strong impression that you are feeling pretty frustrated. Is this true? Does it extend throughout the Organization or is it just another case (which seems to be rather common in NATO-OEEC economic affairs) of everybody being out of step but Canada?

3. And this leads me to ask a further question. I gather that much of the steam behind an attempt to move NATO work of various sorts to Paris is the hope of rescuing OEEC from moribundity (if there is such a word). Personally I have always been rather sceptical about the need for a great deal of economic work in NATO. Therefore I find myself doubting whether there is much work for NATO to hand over to OEEC. Almost all the proposals that come my way seem to consist very largely of exasperating generalities — all form and no substance. In short do you think that NATO can really rescue OEEC or is it just a case of pouring the contents of one empty can into another empty can?

4. I am sending a copy of this letter to Ed Ritchie so that he can be irritated too.

Yours sincerely,

SECRET Paris, May 11, 1951

My dear Wynne [Plumptre]:

Thank you for your two letters.[2] I can assure you that I am always pleased to hear from you.

You do not speak of yourself but I can well imagine that, as usual, you are carrying more than you should, and doing it with a smile.

I enclose as you requested copies of my letter to Claude Isbister. This letter started out as a simple note to Claude on the eve of his return to Canada. Why it should have run on as it did, I don't know. In any case, I was not too shocked or depressed when I re-read it a month later!

In your earlier letter you spoke of NATO/OEEC relations and of the former rescuing the latter from "moribundity". I would say that, if OEEC were as close to death as all that, physical transfer to Paris or any worldly Organization, even of NATO, could not possibly revive and cure it. The fact is that, in my opinion, (a) OEEC is far from being near death (although some debates are deadly dull) and (b), now that the FEB only is setting up house in Paris, even less importance should be attached to the salutary influence which the FEB might have on OEEC. OEEC is not dying. My opinion is that the concept of European economic co-operation cannot afford to die, largely for political reasons: only time will tell if there are any real additional economic reasons why its survival is worthwhile. It is always possible that OEEC's functions might eventually be divided up amongst other organizations — NATO, Council of Europe, (and the Economic Commission for Europe) — such as the American State Department planners have recently envisaged. I think rather that, assuming, as I feel we must, that no redistribution of functions is feasible for sometime to come, OEEC must in the future limit itself to concrete, progressive efforts towards achievement of practical tasks. I think OEEC must abandon grandiose schemes such as are born and die in the minds of "European" politicians or indeed, on the drafting-board of American economic architects! What concrete progress on specific and more modest tasks, for example towards progressive integration on the model or using the machinery of the Schuman Plan, it is difficult to forecast: progress will be, of course, directly dependent on the general international situation; the driving force of American dollars is, fortunately, still present although in another form. It is not essential of course that such tasks be elaborated and agreed on within OEEC. But a three-year old forum in the field of European economic cooperation, endowed as it is with a top-notch Secretariat can, I think, do a useful job to initiate and push such projects along. Furthermore, operation of the EPU and application of the Code of Liberalisation by themselves require a fairly substantial European organization.

As for NATO, I rather share your views. It is, to say the least, difficult to forecast what economic work might be done in NATO unless indeed the present basis for such work is appreciably expanded. I think it is an improvement, however, that what work will be done from now on will be coordinated in the FEB. I know you don't like generalities, anyway here is one in favour of FEB: vague as its usefulness might be, it is nonetheless necessary. Just like, in the political sphere, U.N. is not sufficient to insure the security of the free-world and NATO has become essential, so in the economic field the FEB is required because the only existing economic organization, OEEC, is inadequate mostly because countries which matter are not too interested in it: the U.S. and ourselves are in a rather equivocal position: the United Kingdom is losing interest. The parallel attempted in this generality may not be a balanced one: the vital need for joint security is so much greater than that for "economic co-operation"; and this cooperation need not be carried out in any one organization — the I.M.C. is, we hope, a good example of a break-away. But even if, from the Canadian point of view, we would still prefer bilateral co-operation, it can hardly be satisfactory to our NATO partners or foster the North Atlantic solidarity we hope to achieve.

A practical link between NATO and OEEC is at present being evolved whereby a dozen or so OEEC Secretariat personnel will be loaned to the PARIS NATO Working Group (I don't know what its new name, if any, will be under FEB). As a more substantive link, I can see that informal meetings of the FEB might be held from time to time at which the non-NATO members of OEEC would be invited to participate, thus keeping them 'within the orbit' through the only available forum.

Perhaps, therefore, it is not a question as you say of pouring the contents of one empty can, NATO economic, into another empty can, OEEC. It may be more correct to say that we have two half-empty (or half-full) cans and, from our point of view, that it might be logical (assuming doubtful political feasibility) to throw the contents of one can into the other, i.e. OEEC into NATO. But with the concrete, urgent job which NATO has to do, such an exercise would be unthinkable. As for OEEC, as I said above, perhaps what is required, is to put its contents into a smaller can which might then be full.

You were good enough to think of my own mental attitude when you said that you got the strong impression that I am feeling pretty frustrated. I assure you I am not. I have grown out of that stage. It seems that uncertainties and the lack of prompt-clear-cut decisions are inherent in (human) governmental nature, and with this state of affairs we must live.

I am enjoying my work. With Kilgour, I am trying hard to lend substance to the words "informal association with OEEC" and to make our association useful to you and to our Missions in OEEC countries. Furthermore, the NATO burden-sharing exercise, which has taken a good deal of my time, is an interesting one and, I know, important from our point of view. For good measure, there is always my old friend GATT which pops up now and then. All in all, it's a good life.

With very best wishes,

Yours faithfully,
LOUIS COUILLARD

[Paris], April 4, 1951

My dear Claude [Isbister],

Just a note to wish you and your family Bon Voyage and, as the natives here say, Bonne Rentrée!

We do not know exactly how and when the Torquay gang is being disbanded and returned to headquarters. I can well imagine, however, that as far as you are concerned it's the sooner the better.

Many thanks for your note† in which you enclosed a copy of your letter to Beaup [Beaupré] on intra-European tariff disparity problems. Everyone here read it with interest: it is an excellent exposé of many of the main factors involved. I am looking forward to receiving the documents and the Delegation reports with respect to the Special Session.

It is difficult to see what immediate and positive results can be achieved either at the present Session or from the continuing activities of the GATT intersessional Working Party which, I understand, will be meeting in Paris. To say the least, I cannot see any immediate or sudden solution to the disparity problem, particularly if the W.P. ends up by asking OEEC "by what method" disparities can be removed. The issue, at least of late, has been as dead as a doornail in OEEC which is more concerned with the immediate problems resulting from raw material shortages and with the current efforts to pull Germany out of her current payments difficulties. I think however, that the issue is more like a keg of powder a minute before it blows up.

One personal impression which I have formed watching OEEC struggling with all these problems is that there is a growing tendency on the part of its members to link all these problems together. The pattern generally is for a country which does not like this or that solution or proposal to insist on, as a sine qua non, the solution of a directly related problem. Sometimes the relationship is quite remote. The result is, of course, that the Organization must wrestle with a tangle of problems, the solution to any one being sorrily delayed or made almost inextricable.

You will have seen the brief letter† which we sent Hector [McKinnon] on the attempts of OEEC countries which are members of GATT to agree on a common Note which would be annexed to each of their replies to the GATT Questionnaire on import restrictions and discrimination. We have asked Hector for any comments which the Delegation might have. I have no doubt that your contribution to these comments will be most useful to us.

From our vantage point in OEEC I must say that we are increasingly being forced to realize and perhaps accept the fact that the road to the once sacred objective of non-discriminatory multilateral trade is being detoured more and more in view of the continuing disequilibria and the growing maze of artificial controls. Certainly the old theorical concept of "Economic Equilibrium" is more and more remote from present-day realities. Tradewise, in spite of the sound principles enshrined in international documents, the rule of non-discrimination only remains as a hazy, long-term objective. Discrimination in order to help not only yourself but also the weak sister is in fact closer to the rule followed in EPU, for example. Another form of the same line of action is evidenced by the United Kingdom when they suggest to sterling area countries that in view of the strong position of sterling in EPU, these countries should try to decrease their exports to and increase their imports from other EPU members. It's no longer, therefore, a question, as our strict interpretation of GATT would require of applying QRs and, when necessary, discriminating in order to help yourself, but rather to use every administrative and other means available to help out other countries as well or to prevent your own country from getting into an awkward position (as the United Kingdom's might become in EPU) as the result of third countries running into difficulties.

It is this type of enforced realization, coupled with the fact that an informal meeting of OEEC-GATT members is not the appropriate forum, that has led us to suggest that we refrain from making any preaching remarks or comments at the meeting of the 9th. I may be attaching too much importance to this whole business. On the other hand, I can't help but think that even though the strict and pure principles of GATT are becoming more and more withered, we can do little more than prevent, as far as possible, that the provisions of GATT are not permanently watered down through interpretation which would bless the present practices.

Sitting alone here I'm wondering whether I am being a defeatist or a realist. In any case, enough of that. I hope you will be able to empty your mind of these and similar problems and enjoy your trip back home.

Yours sincerely,
LOUIS COUILLARD

Le ministre de l'ambassade en France

Paris, May 15, 1951

Dear Wynne [Plumptre],

Since we have both been on the signing end of a considerable amount of correspondence recently concerning the activities of the Paris ad hoc Committee on Export Control I think it might be useful to give you a very brief picture of where the work of this Committee now stands.

After a little more than a year and a half of operation I believe this group has shaken itself down and seems to realize where its efforts can be directed with the best success. The Consultative Group itself has not met for some time and I am doubtful if they will have to meet very frequently in the future. The Co-ordinating Committee while not a very high-powered group has been doggedly following up the routine side and in fact in the last few weeks they have been quite active. Over this past week for example there were nearly three full days of meetings. The Commercial Secretary's office has carried a good share of the work in this latter Committee and Mr. Stone in particular has been of great assistance.

There has been a step forward in the Committee in its consideration of bilateral trade agreements. Countries are showing a greater inclination to discuss such agreements before their conclusion, and in particular the actual commodities which communist-dominated countries request. For example not so long ago members of the Committee were asked to express their views concerning a request to France from Poland for a certain amount of ferro-molybdenum and ferro-nickel. In return the Poles offered the very luring bait of about one million tons of coal. During the early days of the Committee countries were very reluctant to have any such scrutiny of their own proposed trade arrangements.

This increase in the consultative function of the Committee does require delegations to take a definite position during discussions. Our own role is a rather equivocal one in many ways. Perhaps our most important function is the maintenance of a watching brief. However the Committee does consider us a full-fledged members and it sometimes is rather embarrassing for our delegates if we are not in a position to state the Canadian view. Unfortunately during the recent discussions on the proposed Franco-Poland agreement we were not in receipt of any instructions from Ottawa and consequently were not able to make a statement. We had sent along a telegram a couple of weeks previously when this question was first raised but no reply had been received by the time of the meeting. I can readily appreciate why the authorities in Ottawa find it difficult to work up much enthusiasm over the Export Control work that is being carried on here in Paris. On the other hand it would help our delegation and perhaps the work of the Committee itself if we were in a position to express at the right moment the official Canadian view.

For our part I fear we have rather burdened you with documents and despatches. The former I should think are probably essential for the records. In the latter we have tried to keep to those aspects of the discussions which are of interest to Canada. I should certainly welcome any suggestions you may care to make about how we might tidy up or improve our reporting in this field.

You might give this some thought and see whether you can think of any way in which a fuller and speedier expression of Canadian official views could be sent us on occasion. It is the old question of taking membership on a body whose activities are of only minor direct interest to Canada. Nevertheless there are times when we are in the limelight, or even on the spot, and we certainly ought to avoid the indignity of a place behind the eight-ball.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Ronnie [Macdonnell]:

I was very pleased to receive your letter of May 15 and to know that you are taking a personal interest in the work of the Committee on Export Controls. Your letter serves to confirm our impression that the member countries have now acquired more confidence in the Committee and are consulting it more frequently.

The staff of the Embassy has been doing fine work in keeping us informed of all the developments of particular concern to Canada. We have no suggestions to offer for improving the present method of reporting.

We usually consult the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Joint Intelligence Bureau of the Department of National Defence in addition to European Division when you ask for guidance on a particular matter. You are probably right in saying that it is difficult for us here to work up enthusiasm over the Export Control work carried on in Paris, but if there be lack of enthusiasm, it is certainly offset by considerable interest and the ready and full co-operation of those concerned in trying to give the Embassy a quick and clear expression of our views.

Methods to hinder Russia and her Satellites in their efforts to obtain strategic goods and scarce raw materials are playing an increasingly important role in world affairs. The work of the Paris group is an integral part in the planning of the Western democracies to thwart these efforts. Canada's export trade restrictions are as severe as those of any country with respect to the movement of strategic goods and scarce raw materials to Communist-dominated areas. We are in full sympathy with the work done in Paris and are very interested in seeing that it is successful.

You mention in your letter that you have not received any guidance from us, although it had been requested, on a proposed Franco-Polish Trade agreement. This has disturbed us somewhat because we try to give you the best possible service. Our files have been checked going back to September, 1950, and we can find no trace of any telegram or correspondence from Paris on the subject. Could you let us have further particulars so that we may satisfy ourselves as to what happened.

Yours sincerely,

INTÉGRATION DE L'EUROPE : LES PLANS SCHUMAN ET PFLIMLIN
EUROPEAN INTEGRATION: SCHUMAN AND PFLIMLIN PLANS

Note de la Direction européenne

Memorandum by European Division

ISCETP DOCUMENT NO. 51-36 [Ottawa], May 17, 1951

SCHUMAN PLAN — POLITICAL IMPLICATIONS

Throughout the negotiations leading to the signature of the Schuman Plan Treaty the French Government made no attempt to disguise the fact that its motives were no less political than economic. Initially, there is little doubt that some of the political considerations which played a part in prompting the French to bring forward their proposal were dictated by narrow self-interest. In the face of failing prestige, France had been searching for a means of seizing the initiative in Europe in some dramatic way which would restore her to a position of leadership; it was also acutely conscious of the need to forestall a resurgence of German militarism by binding West Germany to an international organization capable of preventing the Bonn Government from abusing its ever-increasing political and economic powers. To this end, France was prepared to accept some sacrifice and risk.

2. Despite the existence of certain selfish motives, such as the foregoing, the Schuman Plan is dedicated essentially to the attainment of two lofty political objectives — a new understanding in Franco-German relations and the closer political integration of Western Europe through the creation of supranational institutions. These objectives, as well as the economic objectives of the Plan are set forth in the declared aims of the Treaty. These might be summarized as follows:

(1) To end the traditional antagonism between France and Germany and render war between them impossible by placing their basic industries under international control. Since the Plan involves a partial surrender of sovereignty to supranational authority on the part of not only France and Germany but also Italy, Belgium, Luxembourg and The Netherlands as well, it constitutes a practical step towards the political and economic integration of Europe which France considers indispensable for the preservation of peace.

(2) To integrate and rationalize the production and marketing of the coal and steel resources of Western Europe in order to permit the most effective use to be made of Western European resources as a whole and to contribute to a higher standard of living.

3. Insofar as Canada is concerned, it is the broad political aims set forth in (1) above rather than the economic ramifications of the Plan which have won the general support of the Canadian Government. Indeed, judged on its economic merits alone the Schuman Plan might well fall within the category of restrictive economic proposals concerning which Canadian spokesmen have from time to time voiced reservations. Speaking before the House of Commons on February 22, 1950, Mr. Pearson had said, quoting from his statement at the Colombo Conference:

> "We welcome the prospect of closer economic cooperation among the countries of Western Europe. Such a development might be expected to contribute to the military strength of the democratic countries concerned and also, by eliminating uneconomic production and encouraging competitive efficiency, to hasten the day when they would no longer require extraordinary financial assistance from abroad. It would also restore to countries occupied and ravaged during the war that sense of hope which they need now more than they need United States dollars. Western Europe could once again look forward to playing in the world the great role for which its history and the resourceful intelligence of its people qualify it."

This statement, though made before the coal and steel merger had been proposed, points up strategic and psychological virtues which are certainly present in the Schuman Plan. In the same statement, however, Mr. Pearson qualified his support of certain types of European economic proposals with the following words:

> "Some of the proposals made recently seem to my Government to be as likely to encourage the development of new high cost industries ... as to lead to the objectives of greater efficiency and lower costs and prices at which they purport to be aimed. What must be avoided is the creation of a closed, high cost, inflationary bloc ... which would make progress toward a wider multilateral system of trade and payments more difficult."

This reservation applies at least in part to the coal and steel complex which will emerge from the Schuman proposals.

4. Notwithstanding reservations of this nature which Canada might have had on economic grounds, the Canadian Government did not hesitate to welcome the Schuman proposals when they were first made known, basing its support on the contribution which the Plan was likely to make to European unity and Franco-German understanding. Speaking in the House of Commons on June 5, 1950, Mr. Pearson said of the Schuman Plan:

"The recent French proposal for consolidating Western European coal and steel production under a single control is indicative of the imaginative approach to their problems that Western European nations are making. That is a very important development, as I see it, the importance of which may be as political as (it is) economic. It may mean a long step forward in ending the ancient feud between Gaul and Teuton which has caused so many dark things to be written on the pages of European history. I believe that this is an example of the new approach by Europeans to their problems, and we can only hope it will be successful, both politically and economically."

5. The decision of the United Kingdom Government to remain aloof from the Schuman Plan did not alter the Canadian Government's conviction that closer economic cooperation amongst the countries of Western Europe was indispensable to the security and internal stability of Western Europe. Earlier, the Canadian view on the general question of the relationship of the United Kingdom to developments leading towards European economic unity had been clearly stated by the Canadian Delegate to the Colombo Conference in the following terms:

"It is often said in Canada that in the short run at least such a (closed, European) bloc might do some damage to Canadian trade. I would hope that it would not be serious. Nevertheless, it might be better for us in Canada to suffer some temporary disadvantages rather than to see the prospect of closer economic cooperation which we believe to be necessary in Western Europe made impossible because the United Kingdom is unable to participate."

Relating this general Canadian view of the United Kingdom attitude to the Schuman Plan, Mr. Pearson made the following statement in the House of Commons on September 4, 1950, in reply to a question:

"The Schuman Plan, that wise and imaginative act of French statesmanship was not one which concerned this Government directly ... as it happens, we did informally tell them (the United Kingdom Government) that we thought this was an important and far-reaching Plan, the importance of which was possibly greater politically than economically, and that whatever the economic difficulties may be in carrying it out ... it would be unwise for any government not to fall in at once with the principle behind this Plan to further the integration, politically and economically, of the Western European countries. It would be unwise especially not to do everything to encourage the French in any proposal which may heal the age-long conflict between the French and the Teutons."

Speaking in the House of Commons on February 2, 1951, Mr. Pearson again emphasized Canada's military and political interest in European unity in terms which are applicable to the Schuman Plan as an important phase in the developments leading to such unity:

> "So far as Western Europe is concerned — and this, I repeat, is the most vital area in the front line of our defence — the effort required is partly military and partly, in the broader sense of the term, political. The free nations of Europe are profoundly aware that their future security and prosperity depend in large measure on the unity which they can achieve among themselves ... if there were no other reasons for pressing ahead with these policies of European unification, the problem of Germany itself would make imperative the need for some form of European unity. If democratic Germany is to play her constructive part in a free Europe, it is essential that she should do so within the framework of a freely cooperative Europe coming closer together economically, politically and militarily."

PFLIMLIN PLAN — POLITICAL IMPLICATIONS

The Pflimlin Plan differs in its political aims from previous French plans for the integration of Europe, such as the Schuman Plan and the Pleven Plan for a European Army, in that one of the fundamental objectives of the latter — a Franco-German rapprochement — is virtually absent in the agricultural scheme. On the other hand it shares with the Schuman and Pleven Plans the other major political objective which has guided French policy since the war — that of working towards the complete political and economic integration of Europe. The scope of the Pflimlin Plan is, however, potentially much broader than either of the other two schemes since it aims at the inclusion of some fifteen members of the Council of Europe as well as three non-member states, as opposed to the six and five countries respectively covered by the Schuman Plan and European Army. As a further experiment in supranational institutions the Pflimlin Plan is thus much more ambitious than anything hitherto attempted.

2. The Plan also has special significance because it is being launched under the auspices of the Council of Europe, a body whose success so far has been hampered by the fact that it has had no real task to perform. If the Council of Europe should be successful in this, its first concrete undertaking, its future might be profoundly influenced, and European federalism might receive a new fillip.

3. The fact that the Plan is being launched under the aegis of the Council of Europe introduces new problems in determining the Canadian (and United States) attitude towards that body. Hitherto it has been possible to resist invitations to become more closely associated with that body on the purely political ground that the association of non-European states with the Council would destroy its purely European character and tend to arrest the forward movement towards unity which the Canadian Government has repeatedly endorsed as a desirable objective in Europe. Reasoning along these lines, Canada has been able to say until now with some justification that the interests of the Council of Europe and of the Canadian Government have both been adequately served by simply having an unofficial observer from one of the Canadian missions in Europe present at all sessions of the Consultative Assembly. A preliminary examination of the French memorandum on the Pflimlin Plan for the creation of the agricultural pool shows that there is some possibility that it might have an unfavourable impact on the Canadian economy by tending to create a closed trading area from which North American products would be excluded. It is therefore possible that if closer examination proves this to be the case the detached interest which Canada has shown towards the Council of Europe and its agencies might have to give way to some more active participation in the Council's activities, if only for the protection of Canadian economic interests.

4. If on closer examination it should be confirmed that one of the effects of implementation of the Pflimlin Plan would be to enable Europe to reduce its agricultural imports from North America, it would not necessarily follow that Canada should automatically try to prevent the Plan from going into effect though it might justify the appointment of Canadian observers to keep a close eye on developments. It is conceivable that political and strategic benefits might flow from the creation of the agricultural pool which would outweigh the economic disadvantage to Canada. For example, the agricultural self-sufficiency of Western Europe, to which the proposed Plan might contribute by stepping up production, could be an important factor in the event of war when shipping facilities would not be available for the transport of foodstuffs from North America. Again, from a psychological point of view, the successful implementation of the Plan could, by demonstrating Europe's ability to manage its own affairs in yet another sphere independent of outside aid, have an important effect on the morale of Western Europe and enhance its will to resist. It may be relevant in this connection to recall that the effect of Marshall Aid has been to enable European countries progressively to dispense with North American imports. For the sake of the overriding political benefits achieved this economic disadvantage was accepted in the Marshall Plan, and similar sacrifices might be warranted in connection with the Pflimlin Plan.

5. To sum up, the Pflimlin Plan, as a further step in the integration of Europe could constitute a potential source of political, strategic and economic advantage to Europe and consequently could contribute to the well-being of the whole North Atlantic area, but in its purely economic implications might operate to the ultimate disadvantage of the North American export trade in agricultural products. We may therefore be confronted with a choice between broad political objectives on the one hand and domestic economic interests on the other.

6. It is therefore of importance to obtain some reasonably accurate estimate of the extent of the impact which the Plan could produce on the Canadian economy. Evidently that impact will not be so great if it should transpire that the majority of the countries to whom the French memorandum has been sent show little or no interest in being associated with the Plan. Steps are therefore being taken to obtain, through our missions in Europe, the preliminary reactions of the governments who have been invited to consider the Plan. From the replies received it should be possible to determine whether areas in which Canada has traditionally had a substantial market for agricultural produce are likely to be involved in the Pflimlin Plan. It is understood that Trade and Commerce is preparing, on the basis of the limited information available, a technical appreciation of the merits of the Plan in the light of its possible effect in intra-European trade and on the Canadian economy.

THE SCHUMAN AND PFLIMLIN PLANS
AS THEY AFFECT CANADIAN COMMERCIAL INTERESTS

Introduction

The pressing difficulties that beset postwar Europe, in particular those arising from the disruption of Western Europe's links with Asia and Eastern Europe and the fundamental changes reflected in the dollar shortage, have prompted many different remedial measures and proposals.

Under the name of Trade Liberalization, steps have already been taken to reduce the effects on intra-European trade of some of the quantitative restrictions which have been applied since the war, and to facilitate intra-European payments. Another approach to the problem of integration is that represented by the various schemes, such as the Schuman and Pflimlin Plans, for the pooling of key sectors of Western Europe's economy.

The Schuman Plan has now been signed and awaits ratification, while the Pflimlin Plan is as yet little more than a proposal. Both of them, however, are still a long way from practical realization. Not the least of the obstacles before them is the deep-rooted conflict of interests among Western European countries themselves and their traditional concern for national protectionism. European industries are protectionist-minded and their fear of being exposed to the competition of North American products is sometimes outstripped by their fear of competition from their continental neighbors.

Integration of key sectors of Europe's economy would, if it became a reality, doubtless require modification of the general principles of multilateral trade and would involve, rather, the creation of a protected trading area for specific products.

In appraising Canada's attitude towards such a development the following considerations should be borne in mind:

1. The plans for European integration have as their avowed purpose the restoration of a healthy European economy. Canada's attitude must therefore be based not only on the immediate implications of the plans themselves, but also on an appraisal of their longer-term effects on Western Europe. We are obviously concerned with a dual problem: the kind of trade relationships which we must attempt to establish with European economies and also the viability of these economies in the future.

2. Although Western Europe has declined in importance relatively to other markets for Canadian products, Canada's importance to Europe as a source of supply has been enhanced since the war. The main obstacle limiting imports from Canada has been the dollar shortage.

Manufactured goods are the ones that have suffered most from the limitations on imports imposed by other countries. Canada has been in the relatively fortunate position of being largely an exporter of essential primary commodities which have in many cases been given priority in the import programmes of other countries.

Considering Canada's overall exports to Western Europe, the probabilities are that reductions in certain products would ultimately be compensated by increases in those primary commodities difficult to obtain elsewhere.

3. The concentration of Canadian foreign trade on the United States and the decline in importance of the U.K. and Commonwealth markets in recent years have made it even more desirable for Canada to develop alternative markets and sources of supply.

Canadian Exports to Europe

Prewar

Before the war, Canada's exports to Europe (including U.K. and Eastern Europe), amounted to over 40% of total Canadian exports. The bulk of these exports went to the U.K. and Continental Europe's share amounted, on the average, to about 6% of total Canadian exports.

Canadian exports to Europe consisted largely of primary commodities such as wheat, aluminium, copper, lead, zinc, and asbestos plus bacon and hams, and dairy products, particularly cheese. In addition, wood and paper were important commodities to the U.K. and Germany.

Postwar

Since the war, Canada's pattern of external trade has undergone a major change, shifting from the U.K. market to the U.S. market. Today, about 65% of total Canadian exports go to the U.S. as compared with some 30% in 1938. Correspondingly, Canadian exports to Europe (including U.K.) have declined from over 40% to about 22% of the total. This decline is due almost entirely to the reduction in Canadian exports to the United Kingdom, and has not greatly affected the proportion of Canadian exports going to Continental Europe, which remains at about 6% of the total.

The composition of Canada's exports to Europe remains fundamentally unchanged. Canada remains the supplier of basic agricultural and other commodities to the industrial centres of Europe. About 50% in value of Canada's exports to OEEC countries other than the United Kingdom in 1949 consisted of: wheat (20% of total), other grains, bacon and hams, newsprint and woodpulp, lumber, aluminium, copper, lead, nickel, zinc, and asbestos. These same commodities made up 85% of Canada's exports to the United Kingdom.

The Schuman Plan

1. The Schuman Plan proposes to create a single market for coal, iron and steel products, consisting, so far, of France, West Germany, Italy and Benelux. This would be a free trade area for these products with no quantitative restrictions on their movements within the area. It presupposes the establishment of at least a "harmonized" tariff throughout the six countries on coal and steel imported from other countries. The Plan also calls for the establishment of a "High Authority". This would be a supranational body with precisely defined terms of reference. It is contemplated that it would administer funds to provide alternative employment to firms put out of business from the increased competition. It would also be responsible for modernization and rationalization of the European coal and steel industry.

The products covered by the Schuman Plan include: coal, coke, ores and iron and steel products, including finished sheets and strips. Iron and steel products at further stages of manufacture are not at present included under the Schuman Plan.

2. Under Chapter III of the Draft Treaty for the Schuman Plan, the member states undertake to take joint action towards the Contracting Parties of the GATT in order to exempt the provisions of the Plan from the application of the MFN clause as set forth in Article 1 of GATT. Similar exemptions from the m.f.n. principle would be requested by Schuman Plan countries from other countries with whom they have trade agreements.

3. Canada's commercial interests would not be directly affected to any appreciable extent by the creation of a preferential trading area in coal, iron and steel products in Europe.

Canada is a net exporter of iron ore and alloys but a net importer of primary and semifabricated irons and steels. The bulk of Canada's ore and alloy exports go to the United States, and the bulk of Canada's imports of primary and semifabricated iron and steels come from the United States, with some imports from the United Kingdom, Sweden and Belgium.

Thus, in 1949, of Canada's total primary iron and steel exports of about $56 million, iron ore and alloys accounted for $31.8 million. Of this amount, about $13.8 million went to Europe.

Canadian imports of a very wide range of primary and semifabricated iron and steel products in 1949 totalled nearly $111 million, (while Canadian exports of a much smaller range of these products totalled only some $23 million).

4. Canada's interests in the products affected by the Schuman Plan are those of a net importing, not an exporting country. In so far as this Plan would lead to more efficient, lower-cost production in Europe, Canada would stand to gain by developing possible alternative sources of supply for her iron and steel imports and thus lessen dependence on the United States. Canada would also gain in the long-run if, by this method, Europe could be enabled to earn or save more dollars.

5. United Kingdom Trade in Coal and Steel with the Schuman Plan Countries

	Imports		Exports
	000 tons
	Six countries	Total	Six countries	Total
Coal	—	5	4,408	13,552
Iron ore	415	8,402	—	—
Steel	555	757	130	3,090

Source: Trade and Navigation Accounts of the United Kingdom, Dec. 1950.

Apart from coal exports, United Kingdom trade with the Schuman Plan countries in coal and steel is of only minor importance. Under the present circumstances of a grave shortage of European coal, it is not likely that United Kingdom coal exports would be affected by the formation of the European iron and steel community. If, however, demand for coal was to decline seriously, it is quite possible that discrimination would take place among the members of the community in favour of continental European coal. Under these circumstances the United Kingdom might suffer a more than proportional loss in exports. On the other hand the rationalization of the European coal industry under the influence of the High Authority could cause an increase in coal production. This might effect a reduction of United Kingdom coal exports to the six countries even in times of full employment.

There is a real possibility that, after the formation of the steel and coal complex, the United Kingdom will have to pay higher prices for French North African iron ores than those prevailing for members of the complex. The United Kingdom imported 2.2 million tons of French North African iron ore in 1950. If the members of the complex do get a discriminatory iron ore price, their steel would become more competitive with that of the United Kingdom.

The Pflimlin Plan

1. The proposed Pflimlin Plan seeks to encourage the maximum production of selected agricultural commodities in Western Europe, both as a dollar-saving measure and to combat inflation. It is an attempt to rationalize and modernize agriculture by establishing conditions of stability and security in agricultural production and marketing. To achieve this, the Plan proposes that through organs and procedures similar to those of the Schuman Plan, the member countries pool their productive resources, create a common market, and establish a coordinated subsidy and price-maintenance programme.

The Pflimlin Plan would at the outset apply only to the following commodities: wheat, dairy products, sugar and wine. But a progressive widening of its sphere of action is envisaged by its sponsors.

All OEEC countries have been invited to enter into this scheme.

Although no specific reference to tariffs was made in the original French memorandum proposing this Plan, the creation of a common market with coordinated agricultural marketing operation, clearly implies the establishment of a preferential area for the products affected.

2. Though the Pflimlin Plan itself is as yet only at the blueprint state, the urgency of the tasks it seeks to accomplish is stressed by a recent memorandum by the Secretary-General of OEEC ("Immediate Tasks of Economic Cooperation between Members of OEEC, the U.S. and Canada", C(51)71, Paris 2 March 1951).†

Reviewing the problem of inflation, caused largely by defence stockpiling and by Europe's coal and threatened steel shortage, this memorandum urges increased coal production in Europe as the first step toward increased economic activity. In order to support such increased activity, to fight inflation and to save shipping space, the Secretary-General of OEEC recommends that there "be ... initiated in Europe immediately a food programme designed to increase food production particularly of those basic foodstuffs that have to be imported."

3. Canada's agricultural exports to Europe make up a substantial proportion of her trade with that area, with wheat as the most important single item and the United Kingdom as the main market in this trade.

Wheat, meats and dairy products are the three important items that could be affected by agricultural integration in Europe, if the U.K. were to be included in such a plan. However, assuming the plan were limited to Continental OEEC countries, as would seem more likely, wheat is left as the one important item in which Canada is particularly interested.

4. Wheat

The U.K. remains the largest single market for Canadian wheat exports. However, considerably expanded wheat production in U.K. has caused an overall decline in U.K. import requirements, 75% of which are now furnished by Canada.

At the same time, Continental Europe has greatly increased import requirements, most of which in recent years have been filled from the United States through Marshall aid. The Continental European market is now about two-thirds larger than that of the U.K.

Thus, although traditionally and in recent years Canadian exports of wheat to Continental Europe have been small as compared with exports to the U.K., the potential importance to Canada of a greatly expanded European market must not be minimized.

According to FAO estimates, Western European import requirements for grains in 1952-53 would be well above the pre-war levels, even assuming all the national targets attained and shipments from Eastern Europe resumed.

The question arises, however, whether under concerted and combined European action, and through common marketing arrangements, Western Europe might not be able to exceed present targets and progressively lessen its dependence on overseas supplies of wheat. Such a possibility would be viewed with the greatest concern by Canadian wheat exporters.

5. Canada's long-term interest as a wheat exporting country is clearly to keep open as many of the world's markets as possible. Canada's official attitude toward a proposed Intra-European Grain Agreement in 1950 was to reaffirm Canada's adherence to multilateral trade principles and to the International Wheat Agreement. The Canadian view at that time was that "outside agreements, such as the E.C.A. proposal, are inherently dangerous to the fulfillment of quotas under the International Wheat Agreement." (M.W. Mackenzie).

The present I.W.A. is due to come to an end in July 1953.

Under the I.W.A., guaranteed quotas for importers at ceiling prices and guaranteed quotas for exporters at floor prices are agreed upon. This provides a degree of stability in international wheat marketing. Artificially stimulated wheat production in a protected trading area, as may develop under the Pflimlin Plan, would appear to run counter to the whole conception of international trade underlying the I.W.A.

Should Canada find it inadvisable for political or wider economic reasons to oppose the development of the Pflimlin Plan outright, it would seem desirable to ensure that proper safeguards are established to prevent the ideal of rationalization from being used to foster uneconomic production.

6. Dairy Products

Canada's largest market by far for dairy products is the United Kingdom (cheese exports amounted to $15 million in 1949 and 1950). Apart from this, Belgium has become the largest market for Canadian exports of evaporated milk (taking 40% of these exports in 1950).

The Pflimlin Plan could well operate to eliminate the Belgian market for Canadian milk and could seriously affect Canadian exports of dairy products to the U.K. by increasing Western Europe's share of that market.

7. However, in contrast to wheat, the Canadian dairy industry is not basically an export industry. Long-term trends of population increase and of lower milk production in Canada are combining to make the Canadian dairy industry "statistically and theoretically just self-sufficient". (W.C. Cameron, Assistant-Director, Marketing Service, Department of Agriculture.) As an example, total exports of evaporated milk amounted to about 10% of production in 1950, and while 60 million lbs. of cheese were shipped to the U.K. in 1950, about 5 million lbs. of butter (equivalent to 10 million lbs. of cheese) were imported by Canada.

8. Although Western European agricultural expansion would not be as serious a blow to the Canadian dairy industry as it could be to the wheat producers, the importance and desirability of keeping traditional markets open also applies in this case.

9. Other Products

Wine and sugar, the two other products initially suggested for the Pflimlin Plan, are not Canadian export items. However, this Plan envisages the progressive extension of its scope of action to other products.

With the inclusion of countries such as Norway and France, Portugal and Italy in the Plan, there is a possibility that the fisheries industry might be among the additional sectors to be integrated at some later date.

Norway and France are already direct competitors with Canada in the salt cod trade with Mediterranean and other countries. Any concerted moves toward expanding European fisheries production and protecting the European markets could certainly have serious repercussions on Canada's hard-pressed East Coast fisheries, including Newfoundland.

10. Possible Gains

The only Canadian export commodities that might stand to gain directly from large-scale expansion and modernization of European agriculture are: agricultural machinery, fertilizers, seeds and feedstuffs.

It is unlikely, however, that any gains in these fields could compensate for possible losses in the much more vitally export-oriented wheat industry or in the fisheries, if they were to be included in the Plan.

Conclusion

1. The Schuman and Pflimlin Plans represent the "sector approach" to the problem of European integration. They are still far from practical realization.

2. They could, if they were brought into effect, operate to strengthen Western Europe's economic viability.

3. Canada's long-term interest in a healthy European economy is enhanced by the desirability of developing alternative markets for Canadian goods.

4. There is a danger, however, that integration might act as a screen behind which uneconomic production could be fostered and preserved.

5. The Schuman Plan would not appreciably affect Canada's commercial interests, as Canada is a net importer of iron and steel products mostly from the United States, and as Canada's net exports of ores and alloys will continue to find markets in the United States. The Schuman Plan Treaty would provide for an exemption from the m.f.n. clause of GATT.

6. The Pflimlin Plan could seriously affect future Canadian wheat exports at a time when the United Kingdom market for wheat has contracted while that of Continental Europe has expanded greatly. It could also cut into Canadian exports of dairy products, but these are of secondary importance to the dairy industry. It could conceivably be extended to the fisheries industry, with serious consequences for our fish exports.

This Plan, as it affects wheat, would appear to be in direct conflict with the principles underlying the International Wheat Agreement, which is due to come to an end in July 1953.

Possible gains in Canadian exports to Europe of fertilizers, feedstuffs and agricultural machinery might result from operation of this Plan.

II and III. Consideration of Schuman and Pflimlin Plans

3. The Chairman commended the European Division of the Department of External Affairs and the International Trade Relations Division of the Department of Trade and Commerce upon the preparation of the memoranda dealing with the political and commercial aspects of the Schuman and Pflimlin Plans.

(ISCETP Documents No. 51-36, 51-37 and 51-38)

4. Mr. Isbister referred to the growth of agricultural protectionism in Europe, similar to developments of the 1930's and likely to affect Canadian wheat as well as other exported foodstuffs. Agricultural self-sufficiency may be widely supported by other than farm interests on the ground of the strategic desirability of having a domestic food supply in the event of being overrun or cut-off from shipping services.

The Schuman Plan and the Pflimlin Plan are both symptomatic of underlying conditions in Europe at present. There is a conflict between two sets of forces on the Continent. On the one hand, there is a desire to liberalize trade, perhaps on a multilateral basis, perhaps on a European preferential basis. On the other hand, there is the traditional desire for national protection on the part of established industries. It is difficult to predict the outcome.

In commercial relations with Europe, Mr. Isbister felt that Canada has a dual interest: first, that Europe be strong and prosperous; second, that the European countries should not establish barriers to Canadian goods.

5. Mr. Beattie pointed out that we need to draw a sharp distinction between the two Plans: The Schuman Plan would be more acceptable in that it would likely lead to an increase in the member-states' efficiency; on the other hand, the Pflimlin Plan to be self-sufficient in food could only be achieved at substantial economic cost. In other words, European integration has some meaning as far as the former Plan is concerned but not as regards the latter. Our view, therefore, towards the Schuman Plan might not be that towards the Pflimlin Plan.

6. Mr. Reisman mentioned that while the implementation of either Plan is not imminent, we had already taken the line at Torquay, together with the U.S., that any solution to the problem of the disparities in the levels of European tariffs should be applied generally. The Schuman Plan would be referred to GATT for approval in September and we will have had to pass judgment on it at that time.

7. Mr. Isbister said that with the threat of war it is possible for Europe to put up plans such as the Schuman and Pflimlin on grounds which Canada would find it difficult to oppose.

8. Mr. Campbell pointed out that the Plans were part of the movement towards the complete federation of Europe; other schemes for integration in specified fields, such as transportation, were to follow. Canada had given approval to this "closer political integration of Europe". Possibly it might be advisable to approve the Pflimlin Plan politically but not economically. Since this Plan is being sponsored by the Council of Europe (unlike the Schuman Plan) and since closer Canadian association with that body is being sought on a parliamentary rather than governmental basis (by communications directed to the Speaker of the House of Commons), it might be advisable to arrange for an early ministerial statement of Canadian Government views, after the advantages and disadvantages to Canada had been thoroughly examined at the official level and the conclusions made available to the Minister concerned.

9. Mr. Richards indicated that in considering the Pflimlin Plan obligations assumed under the International Wheat Agreement (which does not expire until July, 1953) should not be ignored.

10. Mr. Isbister mentioned that one of the immediate results of Torquay is that the multilateralists in the U.S.A. who support the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Programme have obviously become weaker.

11. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed,

(1) that replies from Canadian representatives abroad as to the reception towards the Pflimlin Plan would be circulated to members of the Committee; and

(2) that further consideration would be given to both Plans by the members of the Sub-Committee.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], August 21, 1951

You will recall that you asked me to let you know what was being done about the objections put forward by the Belgian authorities regarding the establishment of Belgian immigrants in Canada.[3]

2. This question was originally raised in a note† to the Ambassador in Brussels which expressed the hope that Belgians would no longer be induced to emigrate to Canada without assured employment. Apparently a few Belgian immigrants have started off to Canada under their own arrangements with over-optimistic hopes of immediate success and have found upon their arrival that conditions here are different from those they had expected and have had the usual difficulties in adjustment. Some have sought the assistance of the Belgian Consulate General in Montreal.

3. The Ambassador in Brussels discussed the matter with the Secretary General of the Foreign Ministry and learned from him that the note had been sent out by a junior official without his personal knowledge. He stated, however, that the Belgian Government could not assume responsibility for the support of Belgians who had entered Canada for permanent residence. He realized that it would be impossible to expect 100% of the immigrants to be successful but stressed that they should be carefully warned in advance of conditions in Canada, and suggested that each emigrant, upon receiving his visa, be given a leaflet stating that the Belgian Government could not accept any responsibility for his welfare in Canada.

[3] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I don't think that the Belgians should feel that we have any special responsibility for their emigrants who come to Canada of their own free will. But it must be "of their own free will". If the Belgians get sticky in this matter, we should ask them frankly whether they wish us to close our immigration office in Brussels. L.B.P[earson].

4. The Director of Immigration, to whom this matter has been referred, has stated that the movement of Belgian immigrants to Canada this year has been very successful on the whole and very few problem cases have come to his notice.

5. The Immigration Superintendent in Montreal has already been asked to get in touch with the Belgian Consulate-General there to discuss individual cases. Arrangements are also being made for an informal meeting between the Immigration authorities and an official of the Belgian Embassy in order to obtain a clearer picture of the types of problems which are being encountered. The Ambassador in Brussels will be informed of the results of these discussions so that he may give a final reply to the Foreign Ministry's note.

6. I do not think that improper inducements or undertakings have been given to prospective immigrants by Canadian Immigration Officers in Brussels. One must however always bear in mind that in this business the financial interests of travel agents are inevitably involved. Over the statements of such persons the Canadian Immigration people abroad have little or no control.[4]

DESPATCH C.497 Ottawa, September 25, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference: Your despatch No. 530† and related correspondence.

BELGIAN EMIGRATION TO CANADA

I attach for your information a copy of a memorandum which has been sent to the Belgian Chargé d'Affaires in Ottawa and which relates to discussions and conclusions of an informal meeting which was held in the Department on August 30th to consider problems of Belgian immigrants to Canada.

2. For your private information the Officers of Citizenship and Immigration and of this Department who have been most closely concerned in this matter have come to some fairly definite conclusions as to the source of the difficulties which have arisen. There is no doubt that about 150 Belgian immigrants have gone to the Belgian Consulate-General in Montreal seeking assistance there. The evidence is somewhat inconclusive as to how many of these people went to the Consulate-General on the advice of the local Immigration authorities. Actually no evidence was adduced that anybody had been sent to the Consulate-General by the Canadian authorities. It may be, however, that some, either through misunderstanding or otherwise, have gone to the Consulate-General either on the advice or with the acquiescence of members of the Immigration staff in Montreal.

[4] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Mr. Léger/Cons[ular] Div[ision]: See Minister's direction. Aug 24 A.D.P.H[eeney]

3. In the Belgian Consulate-General in Montreal is a young, enthusiastic and somewhat idealistic officer whose name is Querton. Mr. Querton, who was present at the discussions in Ottawa, evidently feels that he has a very marked duty to his fellow countrymen to see that they are placed in suitable employment after they come to Canada. This is of course a very proper attitude but it leads to snowballing in which any Belgian who has any real or imaginary problems lays them at once upon his doorstep. Mr. Querton has evidently made great efforts on behalf of individuals and there has grown up the idea in Montreal that if a Belgian immigrant cannot immediately get all he wants from Immigration or the National Employment Service the best thing he can do is to carry his troubles to the Consulate-General.

4. By quite informal personal methods we are trying to bring to the attention of Mr. Querton the doubtful wisdom of his becoming so deeply involved in immigration matters. We fear that if his present activities are continued there will always be a certain amount of difficulty. Mr. Querton does not confine himself to helping Belgians to find employment but he seems to get considerable mail from Belgians asking about conditions in Canada and this he tries to deal with in a very detailed way. For example, he supplies a price list of a wide variety of goods and commodities based on prices in Montreal stores. As you know, this is an exceedingly difficult thing to do and the result may easily create false impressions.

5. Canadian officers attending the meeting explained in detail to the Belgian representatives the difficulties of making prospective European immigrants to Canada realize the true conditions of life here. With the best will in the world it is an extraordinarily difficult thing to get over to the European who has made up his mind to come to Canada that he will not immediately find here employment to which he is personally suited and conditions of life much better here than he enjoys in Europe. Nevertheless it was generally agreed that no effort should be spared by which our Immigration staff abroad should bring home to prospective immigrants the truth of the real problems which any immigrant to this country must encounter at the start.

6. You will observe that paragraph 5 (iv) of the attached memorandum states that if the Belgian authorities so desire Immigration representatives in Belgium will advise intending immigrants that after their arrival in Canada they should look to the Canadian and not the Belgian authorities for assistance in placement in employment and that the latter could not assume any responsibility in this respect. You will no doubt be discussing this subject generally with the Foreign Ministry and we should be grateful if you would ascertain their wishes with regard to the advice which our representatives in Belgium should give in this regard.

7. It may be of some interest to you that when he was in Ottawa recently Mr. van Zeeland told Baron de Gaiffier, Chargé d'Affaires at the Belgian Embassy, that he considered this country presented great opportunities for Belgian immigrants but that they should realize before they started that they would have to work harder and that their conditions might be less comfortable at the outset than those which they would leave in Belgium. It is perhaps this aspect of the matter that our Immigration Officers always have to drive home. While there was no evidence before the meeting that our Immigration Officers in Belgium had failed at all in this respect, yet it is perhaps in the nature of things that with a general programme of immigration under way some people particularly travel agents should tend to show the rosy side of life here rather than the reverse. Neither Immigration nor Labour can guarantee to place new immigrants in any specific line of employment from the start. The whole record of the successful immigrant to this country has been that of the man who was willing to take the work that offered and gradually to get himself into the kind of thing that he wanted to do most. Government can go to great lengths in selection and placement of immigrants but in the ultimate analysis it is the heart within the man that matters and sometimes it is only in the school of hard knocks that the lessons can be learned. Despite the triteness of the platitude it is probable that our Immigration officials abroad can do something if perhaps not very much to offset the exaggerated ideas of life in this country that so many intending immigrants possess.

PROBLEMS OF BELGIAN IMMIGRANTS

The Belgian Ministry of Foreign Affairs recently brought to the attention of the Canadian Embassy in Brussels certain difficulties which have arisen in connection with Belgian immigrants who have come to Canada in the course of the last few months. It was decided to convene a meeting with Representatives of the Belgian Embassy here and the Belgian Consulate General in Montreal, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the Department of External Affairs for informal discussion of the problems involved. This meeting took place on August 30, 1951, in Room 117, the East Block, Ottawa, at 11.30 a.m.

2. There were present:

Baron Pierre de Gaiffier d'Hestroy,
Chargé d'Affaires of the Belgian Embassy;
Mr. Jean Querton,
Belgian Consulate General in Montreal;
Mr. C.E.S. Smith,
Director of Immigration;
Mr. J.A. Paul,
Chief of the Immigration Settlement Service;
Mr. L.G. Chance,
Department of External Affairs;
Mr. A.A. Day,
Department of External Affairs;
Mr. P.L. Trottier,
Department of External Affairs;
Mr. W.K. Wardroper,
Department of External Affairs.

3. In course of discussion it was observed that:

(a) The great majority of Belgian immigrants coming to Canada had been easily and satisfactorily established. Belgians generally were regarded as highly desirable immigrants to this country;

(b) Belgian immigrants coming to Canada fall into two categories:

(i) those who have some means and make their way to this country entirely on their own resources; and

(ii) those who avail themselves of the Assisted Passage Scheme or who, though they have enough funds to pay for their transportation to Canada, must find employment and accommodation upon their arrival.

(c) A certain percentage of problem cases is inseparable from any period of active immigration. Rosy impressions form themselves in the minds of intending immigrants to the New World which, however erroneous, cannot always be eradicated except in the school of actual experience. The majority of problem cases have arisen among those who came to Canada on their own resources and who, finding conditions not as they had expected them to be, had carried their troubles to the Belgian Consulate General in Montreal. The latter had befriended them and in all but a few outstanding difficult cases had succeeded in getting the immigrants satisfactorily placed through the active Belgian community in Montreal and the co-operation of the local Immigration and Employment Service authorities.

(d) There was no evidence that in any case the Canadian Immigration authorities had referred the immigrants in difficulty to the Belgian Consulate General or Embassy. It was, however, evident that the Belgian Consulate General in Montreal had taken a great deal of interest in Belgian immigrants and it was possible that from this fact had arisen the idea in the minds of a number of these people that they should take their difficulties to the Consulate General rather than to the Canadian authorities concerned in the placement of those seeking employment. The Consulate General had not encouraged such a movement but the news of assistance quickly spreads among a group of newcomers and this had resulted in perhaps 150 persons approaching the Consulate General for help.

4. Representatives of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration reaffirmed that they assumed full responsibility for the placement in employment of persons who come to Canada under the Assisted Passage Scheme or who are without funds upon their arrival here, though they could not guarantee any specific employment. It was explained further that the whole history of migration to Canada had demonstrated general success over the years of those who were willing during the first months or years to accept any work until that which was more suited to their general qualifications was found.

5. It was agreed

(i) that it would be regrettable if the movement of Belgians to Canada were restricted because a relatively few minor difficulties had arisen in individual cases;

(ii) that the Belgian Consulate General in Montreal would refer immediately to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration any outstanding problem cases and that the latter would make every effort to find suitable employment for the individuals;

(iii) that the Director of Immigration would again caution Immigration Officers in Brussels to be particularly careful when interviewing prospective immigrants to point out the true nature of conditions in Canada. (No evidence had been adduced during the meeting indicating that there had been any failure on the part of Immigration Officers in Belgium in this respect);

(iv) that if the Belgian authorities so desired Immigration representatives in Belgium would advise intending migrants that after their arrival in Canada they should look to the Canadian and not the Belgian authorities for assistance in placement in employment and that the latter could not assume any responsibility in this respect.

BELGIAN EMIGRATION TO CANADA

You will find herewith copies of a memorandum on the meeting which was held at the Foreign Ministry on November 21 on the occasion of Mr. C.E.S. Smith's visit to Brussels in connection with the Migration Conference.[5]

2. This memorandum is self-explanatory. I am told that the meeting took place in a friendly atmosphere and that M. Geeraerts, who in the past appeared to be the Belgian official most concerned about the difficulties encountered by Belgian immigrants in Canada, went out of his way to point out that difficult cases had been the exception.

3. A copy of the attached memorandum was given to Mr. C.E.S. Smith. You will no doubt be informed of the views of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration on the point raised in the last paragraph of the memorandum.

Memorandum

BELGIAN IMMIGRATION TO CANADA

During his conversation of August 1, 1951, with Mr. Arnold Smith on the above subject, the Secretary General of the Foreign Ministry suggested that, in order to avoid misunderstandings with regard to the Belgian Government's responsibility vis-à-vis Belgian emigrants upon their arrival in Canada, a printed paper explaining the limitation of its responsibility might be given to all Belgian emigrants before they leave. Mr. Smith's reply was that this might be possible and that any such request would be transmitted to the Canadian authorities.

2. During the meeting of August 30 which took place in Ottawa between the Belgian Chargé d'Affaires, the Belgian Consul General in Montreal and representatives of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration (including Mr. C.E.S. Smith) and the Department of External Affairs, it was agreed:

> "That if the Belgian authorities so desired Immigration representatives in Belgium would advise intending migrants that after their arrival in Canada they should look to the Canadian and not the Belgian authorities for assistance in placement in employment and that the latter could not assume any responsibility in this respect."

3. A meeting took place in the Foreign Ministry on November 21, 1951, with a view to discussing this problem. The meeting was attended by:

M. Contempré,
Directeur Général de la Chancellerie et du Contentieux, Ministère des Affaires Étrangères
M. Geeraerts,
Ministère des Affaires Étrangères
Mr. C.E.S. Smith,
Director of Immigration for Canada
Mr. L.A. Chevrier,
Acting Head of Immigration Office, Brussels
Mr. Roger Chaput,
Second Secretary, Canadian Embassy, Brussels.

4. The Belgian representatives referred briefly to the difficulties which had been encountered in Canada by Belgian immigrants on their arrival there. While they readily pointed out that difficult cases had been the exception, the Belgian representatives underlined the following two points with a view to keeping these cases to a minimum:

(1) The Canadian Immigration Officers in Belgium should make a point of giving prospective immigrants a true picture of the conditions in which they would find themselves upon their arrival in Canada and of the specific problems with which they would be confronted.

(2) It should be made clear to Belgian immigrants before they leave that the Belgian Government does not hold itself responsible for the securing of employment for Belgian immigrants and for their maintenance and eventual repatriation.

5. With regard to the first point, the Canadian Immigration Officers present emphasized that everything possible was being done in order to convey to the applicants an exact picture of the situation in which they would find themselves in Canada, and also of conditions in Canada in general. On the latter point it was impossible to furnish detailed information on such items as wages and prices since these varied from one day to another and also from one region to another. The supplying of up-to-date information on these points to Immigration Offices abroad had been found an insuperable task. The Belgian officials expressed their appreciation of the Canadian position on this point. Confirmation of the Canadian Government's commitments in the matter of employment — namely guarantee of employment but not of any specific employment — was at the same time given to the Belgian officials.

6. With regard to the second point, Canadian officials underlined that there had been no evidence that Immigration Officials in Canada had referred immigrants to Belgian Consulates. In some cases however, Belgian immigrants had called at Belgian Consulates before they had submitted proper applications to the Canadian authorities. It was suggested that the Belgian authorities might advise, before their departure, Belgian citizens emigrating to Canada that the Belgian Government could not assume responsibility in connection with the securing of employment and the furnishing of financial assistance. This might take the form of a printed sheet which would be given to emigrants by the Belgian authorities at the time passports were issued, or by banks at the time foreign exchange was obtained.

7. The Belgian representatives pointed out that the situation in Belgium with regard to passport-issuing authorities did not permit the implementation of the Canadian suggestion since Belgian passports are issued by municipal authorities in every town having a population of 5,000 or more. Moreover, each Belgian citizen is entitled to a passport as a matter of right, whatever may be the purpose of his request. This situation hardly lends itself to the questioning of applicants which the implementation of the Canadian suggestion would necessarily involve. The alternative, which was the release of the printed sheet referred to above to all applicants, was obviously unwarranted, and at any rate undesirable from the Canadian point of view, since it might easily create false impressions on the conditions awaiting Belgian immigrants upon their arrival in Canada.

8. The Belgian representatives suggested that the easiest way to solve this problem might be for Canada to include a text to be agreed upon by both parties among the documentation which is distributed to each applicant as a matter of course by the Canadian Immigration Office in Brussels. This text could be either incorporated in one of the documents already being distributed, or take the form of a separate document.

9. The Canadian Immigration Officers intimated that it would be preferable from the Canadian point of view to have a separate document which would be added to the standard documentation already given. The Belgian officials submitted a draft text for the approval of the meeting, the last sentence of which reads as follows:

> "However, Belgian immigrants may, like any other of their compatriots, have recourse to the good offices of the Belgian Consulates with a view to securing information and assistance in connection with letters of introduction which they may need."

10. Though expressing their general approval of the text submitted, the Canadian representatives pointed out that the sentence quoted above might induce Belgian immigrants to apply to Belgian Consulates in Canada for something more than mere information or letters of introduction. The Belgian representatives agreed with this, but intimated that the deletion, pure and simple, of the above sentence would leave Belgian immigrants with the impression that the Belgian Government considered that they had ceased to be Belgian citizens at the time of their arrival in Canada and that Belgian Consulates would not consider legitimate requests dealing with passports, birth certificates and similar services.

11. A revised draft of the last sentence was ultimately approved by the meeting. On the other hand, it was suggested by the Canadian representatives that in view of the fact that the text which the Canadian authorities were called upon to distribute consisted of a message from the Belgian Government, an introductory sentence should be added which would indicate the source of the message. The Belgian representatives concurred in this suggestion.

12. The text finally agreed upon read as follows:

"The Belgian Government has requested us to inform you of the following:

"Generally speaking, emigrants are going to Canada at their own risk. However, the Canadian Immigration Services undertake to find employment for persons arriving in Canada under the assisted-passage scheme or who are without financial means at the time of their arrival, though they do not guarantee any specific employment. Belgian emigrants must address themselves to the Canadian Immigration Services at the time of their arrival in Canada, and not to Belgian Consulates. The latter cannot assume the responsibility of finding employment and, a fortiori,[6] a particular employment suited to the capacities and desires of the persons concerned, or of furnishing financial assistance for their maintenance or their eventual repatriation. However, the Belgian Consulates remain at the disposal of immigrants for any other services which they may require as Belgian citizens."

13. The Director of Immigration undertook to submit the new text to the Canadian authorities for approval together with the suggestion that it be distributed by Canadian Immigration Offices in Brussels.

RESTRICTIONS À L'IMPORTATION IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

Memorandum

[n.d.]

INTENSIFICATION OF IMPORT RESTRICTIONS BY BELGIUM

The Governments of the Economic Union of Belgium and Luxembourg recently announced that intensified restrictions would be applied against imports from dollar countries. The reason for these restrictions stems from the substantial trade surplus which Belgium has with other members of the E.P.U. Under present conditions, the surplus must be financed either by credits by Belgium or by gold payments by the debtor countries. It appears that Belgium is not prepared to extend further credit to the extent necessary to cover its present surplus and the debtor countries are not willing or able to finance it with gold. The O.E.E.C. and E.P.U. have suggested that Belgium should attempt to correct this situation by diverting certain of its imports from the dollar area to E.P.U. countries by means of discriminatory restrictions.

The Canadian Delegation, presently attending the Sixth Session of the Contracting Parties of the G.A.T.T., has been informed that the Belgian Delegation intends to raise this matter at the current session.[7] How to present the case appears to be delaying this action because it is difficult to envisage how the new restrictions can be permitted within the provisions of the G.A.T.T. Articles XI and XII, which deal with import restrictions, do not make provision for a country to apply restrictions in a discriminatory manner in order to help debtor countries, unless it is in balance of payments difficulties itself with the countries against which it is discriminating.

The Belgians do not appear to have decided under which articles of the G.A.T.T. they will raise the matter. According to a communication from the Canadian Delegation, the Belgians may try to claim that without such new restrictions their gold and hard currency reserves will be impaired. In this connection their reasoning appears to be that the other E.P.U. members, some of whom now pay for a substantial part of their purchases in Belgium with gold or dollars, will curtail their purchases in Belgium. Thus that country's gold and dollar reserve will be decreased. Unless Belgium's imports from the dollar area are likewise reduced, there will be a depletion of the country's reserves.

It is difficult to foresee how such a case could be justified. There has been no impairment of Belgium's reserves; to what extent, if any, there would be a decrease is a matter of conjecture. It would therefore be difficult to sanction a remedy for a problem that might not arise.

The Belgian restrictions will have a considerable influence on Canadian trade with that country. Some of the new restrictions became effective on September 10th and a number of Canadian exporters have already been told that in future no licenses will be issued for the importation of their products. These include cheddar cheese, nylon stockings, toys, washing machines and possibly whiskey.

Up to the present the Belgian authorities have issued a list of items that will not be subject to licensing. All other goods are to be subject to restriction. No regulations have yet been released respecting whether quotas will be established for these items or which ones will be prohibited. In the past it has often been the practice of the Belgian authorities not to make this information public, but to issue or deny licences on a basis known only to them.

In spite of the lack of definite information, it has been possible to make a preliminary appraisal of the damage that may result to Canadian exports. The following two tables† show, first, the list of Canadian exports to Belgium in 1950 which were subject to licensing prior to the new restrictions and which will continue to be under licence. Licences were freely granted for most of these products prior to September 10. The second list shows those exports in 1950 for which no licence was formerly required but which are now subject to restrictions.

These lists have been studied by the commodity specialists of this Department. They have indicated, for each item, whether in their opinion, similar goods in the same quantities can be obtained in Europe. The results are as follows:

1. Total Canadian exports to Belgium-Luxembourg were roughly $66 million.

2. The exports of goods to be subject to licensing under the new regulations amount to $10.647 million.

3. In the opinions of the commodity officers Belgium will have to continue importing $3.8 million of the products placed under restriction. It might be possible to do without $6.8 million which could be bought in Europe.

4. It is in Canada's interests to attempt to keep the Belgian market for many of the items that could be procured in Europe. This market has been built up with considerable effort and for many lines is the only one in Europe which is open to Canadian exporters.

Conclusion

The Canadian Delegation to G.A.T.T. should take the position that these measures cannot be justified under the provisions of the Agreement. The Delegation ask that the CONTRACTING PARTIES request Belgium to again consult with O.E.E.C. and E.P.U. with a view to finding an alternative and more constructive method of solving that country's balance of payments problems with other members of the E.P.U.[8]

Your No. 89†, 97† and 101† of September 25, October 2 and 3 — Belgian Import Restrictions.

1. Officials of Departments concerned here take very serious view of new Belgian import restrictions. There seems no doubt that these are already in force. Complaints have been received from Canadian exporters of cheddar cheese, nylon stockings, toys, washing machines, and whisky and position has been confirmed with our Trade Commissions in Brussels. Belgium was our third largest market in 1950. Full details have been mailed to you by Trade and Commerce. It is particularly regrettable that, in the name of European trade liberalization, certain Canadian exports are now being excluded from the one European market to which they had relatively free access. This apparently confirms our earlier forebodings when EPU was set up.

2. We take the view that Belgium is not faced by any emergency either in reserves or balance of payments and that they should therefore have consulted with other Contracting Parties before (repeat before) imposing restrictions. You should make strong informal representations to have restrictions removed immediately. If these are not successful, you should make a formal protest in the Contracting Parties based on Article XII 4(a) unless you are fully satisfied that Paris discussions are leading to immediate removal.

3. Willoughby tells us that about a week ago the United States Delegation was instructed to take the following line:

(a) It is doubtful whether Belgian reserves are threatened as provided for in Article XII 2.

(b) Whether Belgian reserves fall will depend on several factors, including the settlement of the Belgian EPU surplus.

(c) Under Article XV Monetary Fund must be consulted before GATT reaches decision on restrictions.

(e) Meanwhile Contracting Parties should take no further action (and even consultation with Fund should be deferred until after EPU decisions are reached).

Willoughby understands that these instructions were sent when United States authorities were in doubt whether Belgian restrictions had in fact been introduced. We would support U.S. line of action if, but only if, the new restrictions were now immediately withdrawn.

4. Reports by Michael Hoffman suggested Belgian action was prompted by ECA. This has been definitely denied.

BELGIAN IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

Following from GATT delegation, Begins: We have seen Suetens, Head of Belgian Delegation, and informed him of our position as instructed. Suetens is now awaiting consultation in Brussels and final instructions which he hopes to have by October 17th.

2. We told the Belgians that in our view they should remove their new import restrictions immediately. If they believe Belgium to be in balance of payment difficulties, consultation may then be initiated under Article XII(4)(a) of GATT. Should Belgium not take initiative in this way, we informed them that we would raise this matter ourselves in contracting parties but we said we would prefer them to take the initiative.

3. Since Monetary Fund must prepare information, there is no chance whatever of any consultation with Belgium being completed at this session of the contracting parties.

4. Belgians mentioned the possibility that they might declare their programme to be (import ?) restrictions under Fund Article XIV. We told them we would give careful consideration to any claim they might make to being in balance of payment difficulties. On the other hand, we said that our representatives in the Fund would certainly oppose Belgian use of enemy occupation clause to justify these measures imposed six years after war.

5. United States now agree that this case should be handled under GATT Article XII(4)(a) rather than under Fund article and have so informed Belgians.

6. Belgian delegation is obviously worried by dose of buckshot we have administered. We cannot yet guess what the Belgian Government will decide to do.

BELGIAN IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

Following from GATT delegation, Begins: Pending further developments we are consulting with principal delegations concerning Belgian case.

2. United Kingdom informed us that in their view Belgium is justified in imposing dollar import restrictions. They said further that if issue is raised in GATT United Kingdom will strongly support any case which Belgium will put forward for such measures. It was quite clear from the discussions that the United Kingdom has been urging Belgium to impose restrictions against dollar goods.

3. United Kingdom regards the issue as involving the continued existence of EPU. They said failure by Belgium to cut down its EPU surplus will compel United Kingdom to impose severe restrictions against Belgian imports which would drive Belgium out of EPU. While United Kingdom recognizes that a constructive approach to the problem would be Belgian relaxation of restrictions on imports of agricultural and fisheries products, they insist that this will not, repeat not, suffice. As to measures by Belgium to divert exports to dollar countries United Kingdom say that such actions will cut across NATO defense programmes.

4. United Kingdom indicated they would prefer that the issue not be raised at present. We said that the most effective way of avoiding the issue here would be for Belgium to remove new dollar restrictions immediately and suggested United Kingdom might help convince Belgium to do this, we also told United Kingdom that we were seriously disturbed to learn United Kingdom intend to support the Belgian case for dollar restrictions. You may wish to consider desirability of direct representation to the United Kingdom concerning this matter. Ends.

BELGIAN IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

1. In our immediately following telegram† we are repeating telegram No. 107 of October 10 from Geneva. Will you please make the representations to the United Kingdom authorities suggested in paragraph four.

2. Since we do not know all the facts of the case we are not at this stage prepared to argue whether or not Belgium will be faced by a "need" to impose import restrictions against dollar goods. We do however take the view based on our knowledge of relevant facts that Belgium is not faced by any immediate emergency either in reserves or balance of payments and that they should therefore have consulted with other contracting parties before (repeat before) imposing restrictions. We have made strong representations to them to this effect in Geneva.

3. It appears that the United Kingdom has supported the Belgians not only in their imposition of restrictions but in their unwillingness to raise the matter for discussion in GATT. We would gather from the telegram from Geneva that United Kingdom if faced by a choice between damage to EPU on the one hand and flagrant disregard for GATT obligations on the other would unhesitatingly approve the latter course. We believe that their choice is to say the least open to question. We believe that EPU has served and should continue to serve a very useful purpose in Europe but we have never and could never accept the view that Canadian interests must automatically be sacrificed to it.

4. Please keep in mind that our immediate objective is to get existing Belgian restrictions removed and to avoid, not to precipitate, endless technical wrangles in GATT with restrictions still in effect.

BELGIAN IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

Please note the telegram to London which I initiated on October 12, and sent to U.S.S.E.A. for signature. I checked it with Hume Wright and Barrow before sending it upstairs (Deutsch is still out of town and Bull was tied up).

Both Hume and I are rather worried that our delegation in Geneva may be rushing ahead "thirsting for blood" without (if I may mix a metaphor) also "keeping their eye on the ball". Our purpose should not be to uphold every letter of the law of GATT, but rather to protect Canadian interests which, in this instance, means that we should bend our efforts to getting the existing restrictions removed and not in precipitating an argument over technicalities with the restrictions still in force.

It is my feeling, with which both Wright and Barrow seem inclined to agree, that we should not even be too insistent on threshing the whole matter out in GATT. After all GATT does not provide for all circumstances. We have recognized that it does not adequately provide for the existence of the sterling area and have not supported the United States or the Fund in their efforts to insist that sterling area countries cannot impose import restrictions unless their own (as opposed to the central) dollar reserves are falling. It may be that we shall have to recognize that GATT does not fully take account of the existence of EPU and that discussions relating to EPU matters may sometimes better be held outside GATT than inside it. The importance thing is that we should always be given a reasonable chance to protect Canadian interests and, consequently, if Canadian interests are going to be hurt then we should be in a position to explain and in a measure to defend the position taken by other countries when Canadian exporters rush indignantly up to Ottawa.[9]

In short, I feel we should envisage the possibility of discussions with the Belgians and perhaps with the others concerned outside GATT, but this a serious matter of policy which certainly would have to be discussed and considered fully by the departments concerned. Barrow has undertaken to explore it with Bull; Wright has undertaken to raise it with Deutsch when he gets back on Tuesday. It may be that the other departments will agree to send a telegram somewhat softening our earlier instructions to raise the matter formally in the Contracting Parties unless they can get immediate satisfaction from the Belgians. We must, of course, act reasonably quickly otherwise our delegation will act on their existing instructions, and, of course, it may turn out that this is the best thing to do. I am not seriously opposed to the existing policy; I only think that the matter should be reviewed again quickly in the light of developments since these instructions were sent.

A.F.W. P[LUMPTRE]

P.S. Since this was dictated two things have happened: (a) Bull has had a talk with Barrow and others and has agreed that I should sent out a telegram to Isbister telling him not to make a formal protest in C.P's until he hears from us again,[10] and (b) Meanwhile, a meeting of the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy will be called.

I am sending a copy of this to the Under-Secretary who might wish to have it at the meeting.

BELGIAN IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

1. In meeting with Dillon Glendinning, Deputy Director, Office of International Finance, Treasury Department, yesterday, Wolfson received the impression that the United States Treasury was reluctant to adopt any strong stand regarding Belgium's introduction of discriminatory measures against dollar imports. United States Treasury thinking seems uncertain because they realize the dilemma inherent in the fundamental contradictions of the policies which they have been advocating. The encouragement which has been given to European union, more particularly as expressed in the EPU arrangements, implies that the European group as a whole may resort to discrimination against dollar imports if in their opinion this be the most practical method of correcting internal imbalance. On the other hand, Glendinning appreciates that the advocacy or even acceptance of such policies may run diametrically against GATT and IMF policies and interests.

2. Glendinning implied that perhaps the most advisable course would be to permit the situation to ride for a few months and then decide on appropriate action. Wolfson pointed out that silence during the next few months would make it more difficult to demand modified action from Belgium at a later date. He suggested that as in any event the list of commodities to which discriminatory measures had been applied were mainly of the non-essential variety, there was little reason to hope for any substantial shift in imports from dollar to EPU countries. Thus whilst giving questionable relief to EPU imbalance, the Belgians would, however, be setting a most undesirable precedent, viz: imposing discriminatory practices not as a defence against a sharply deteriorating balance of payments, but on the contrary, they would be imposing discriminatory practices because their position was too favourable.

3. Glendinning admitted the force of these observations, but asked what would be the United States position if in fact Belgium did not adopt a policy of dollar discrimination and then found herself in an adverse balance of payments position in a few months time. Wolfson countered by suggesting:

(a) There was no logical reason why the Belgium tendency to have a surplus balance should not continue even if there were no discrimination — this in fact has been happening in recent months.

(b) Even if there were some deterioration the surplus each month has been so large that what might be expected is a smaller surplus or very slight deficit only.

(c) The accumulated reserves were so large that even if there were a slight deficit on current account the Belgian position would not be seriously affected.

(d) The IMF might well indicate its willingness to allow Belgium to draw in order to have a secondary line of reserves. Belgium should prima facie be an attractive instance to initiate IMF member drawings.

4. Glendinning and Wolfson agreed to meet again next week to consider the problem somewhat further. These few comments may, however, be of some use in indicating present Treasury thinking.

POSITION OF BLEU IN EPU

The Managing Board has reported on the problem and has recommended a short-term solution to December 31st, the details of which you have received from Brussels. If implemented, this formula would mean a real sacrifice by EPU because gold payments would likely come entirely from EPU resources. It is uncertain at present if the Belgian Government is prepared to accept this plan.

2. The Managing Board in its analysis of the Bleu position concludes that the preponderant factor is Belgium's current payments position vis-à-vis the United Kingdom and France. Statistics for the third quarter indicate an improvement in the Bleu balance of payments position with the Netherlands and a very substantial increase in the deficit with the United Kingdom and France. The Managing Board ascribes this trend to rearmament orders and the larger degrees of inflation which obtains in the United Kingdom and France as compared with Belgium. The report states that forces outside the control of the Managing Board are seriously affecting the stability of EPU and the problem of a long-term solution, therefore, is beyond its control. The report refers in a general way to "the international financing of rearmament" as an important factor and states that "any arrangement which may be made in this field may have marked repercussions in EPU". As these matters are beyond the competence of the board it confines itself to drawing the attention of the council to the need to consider these factors when discussing any long-term solution.

3. The general recommendations of the Managing Board include:

(a) a request to Bleu to increase imports from EPU countries,

(b) a request to other member countries to encourage exports to Bleu,

(c) Belgium should actively pursue a policy of internal expansion,

(d) the board's observations on rearmament and the financing of rearmament in regard to the problem of the Bleu surplus should be drawn to the attention of member governments and other governments associated with the OEEC,

(e) that discussions should take place between the Bleu and the member countries concerned on any other methods to reduce the net surplus of Bleu.

4. The report will be examined by the council on October 17th and we propose to make the following comments. The Managing Board's analysis of the problem does not consider the extent to which the speculative inflow of capital into Belgium is responsible for present difficulties and probably exaggerates the responsibility of rearmament orders by the United Kingdom. A more detailed examination of the trend during August and September may therefore be desirable. Information in October indicates the problem has become essentially that of a capital inflow. The main remedial measures therefore should endeavour to cope with this aspect of the problem. While some redirection of exports from European markets to the dollar area may be desirable, we view with considerable dissatisfaction the measures, endorsed by the Managing Board, to restrict dollar imports. Belgium has no balance of payments problem with the dollar area and such measures cannot but tend to increase costs for Belgium without promoting a viable solution. The volume of dollar imports to be restricted has been tentatively indicated as $60 million per year. In view of the magnitude of the Belgian problem the restrictions on dollar imports are quantitatively of little help; and in view of what we consider to be the main cause of the Belgian problem, the dollar restrictions offer no solution. We shall also state that the dollar restrictions are in our opinion contrary to international agreements to which both Belgium and ourselves are partners, namely GATT and perhaps IMF. We therefore consider that there should have been consultation and should still be consultation in these organizations before any action to restrict dollar imports is taken.

BELGIAN IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

In accordance with your message, Plumptre and Ritchie met this afternoon with Symon of the CRO and representatives of both the Treasury and Board of Trade to discuss the United Kingdom attitude towards the Belgian restrictions and towards possible consultation under GATT regarding those restrictions. We emphasized the concern of Canadian exporters and the Canadian Government at the effects of the Belgian measures. We also stressed how disturbed the Canadian authorities were by the lack of consultation on the introduction of these restrictions and at the indications that the United Kingdom government was supporting the Belgians in their apparent reluctance to consult the contracting parties to the GATT. We expressed the view that the new restrictions should be withdrawn pending consultation.

2. The United Kingdom representative argued that the Belgian restrictions on dollar imports were essential to the preservation of the EPU and for the maintenance of intra-European trade which was essential to the rearmament programme. They pointed out that other measures than the curtailment of dollar imports were also being resorted to by the Belgians to correct the position. It was hoped, however, that it would not be necessary for the other European countries to go back on the trade liberalization which had been achieved among themselves during the past year or so, although it was conceivable that individual countries might find it necessary to increase their restrictions on imports from Belgium.

3. In summarizing the United Kingdom attitude, Symon stated that:

(a) The restrictions imposed by Belgium were regarded by the United Kingdom as justified in the interests of the EPU.

(b) In view of the emergency situation in EPU, the United Kingdom would oppose the withholding or withdrawal of the Belgian restrictions on dollar imports.

(c) The United Kingdom authorities would not be opposed to the Belgians entering into appropriate consultations if the import restrictions could be introduced or maintained during the course of such consultations (which United Kingdom officials think would be rather lengthy).

BELGIAN IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

1. In conversation this morning between Wolfson and Dillon Glendinning, Deputy Director, Office of International Finance and Secretary of the National Advisory Council, Treasury Department, we learned that in yesterday's meeting of the N.A.C. serious consideration had been given to the arguments put forward in our conversation with Glendinning. It has been decided that the United States GATT delegation will be instructed to pursue a course designed to reinforce the action which they anticipate that the Canadian delegation will initiate under GATT Article XII (4).

2. The United States delegation will join in a protest against the Belgian adoption of discriminatory action against dollar imports, probably framing its observations on cautious lines. They assume that the issue will lead to the consultation procedures envisaged under the GATT articles. This will serve to place the onus on the Belgians to prove how their situation justifies the adoption of the measures contemplated. Such consultations will, however, obviously take time, in the course of which the United States hopes that the other factors in the picture to which they attach particular significance will emerge more clearly. These center mainly around the eventual extent of Belgium's contribution to the NATO effort, and the effect which any increase in United States off-shore purchases in Western Europe may have on the EPU position.

3. In general, the gist of the United States attitude will be that they do not see how the restrictions against dollar imports would be an essential element in the solution of the present difficulties. Glendinning intimated that the United States GATT delegation will be contacting our representatives in Geneva in this regard.

BELGIAN IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

Following from GATT Delegation, Begins: Ottawa please repeat to London and to Deutsch in Paris.

1. United States Government has now adopted firm policy on this issue which will be followed by their representatives in whatever forum it arises including GATT, Fund and EPU. Policy is as follows.

2. (a) Belgian import restrictions must be justified on Belgian balance of payment grounds under GATT Article XII.

(b) On evidence available United States does not, repeat not, consider these restrictions to be justified on balance of payment grounds.

(c) United States believe dollar import restrictions are not, repeat not, necessary as a remedy for Belgian surplus in EPU.

(d) Consultations must take place under GATT Article XII 4(a) and these must be initiated immediately.

(e) Even if Belgians argue that these restrictions are essentially reasonable restrictions falling under Article XIV of Fund, they must nevertheless be justified under Article XII of GATT inasmuch as they are quantitative restrictions on trade.

3. If Belgium does not, repeat not, herself seek consultation under GATT, United States would prefer that Canada request such consultation because of our stronger position as a country not directly involved in EPU.

4. Next meeting of contracting parties will be held Thursday, October 18th. Must have instructions by that time.

5. Belgium is being informed of United States position immediately. Firm position by Canada before Thursday would further help influence decision of Belgian Government.

I. BELGIAN IMPORT RESTRICTIONS; INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION TO G.A.T.T.

1. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that, in the face of its steadily increasing surplus as the chief creditor of E.P.U. and of a considerable inflow of speculative capital, Belgium had recently taken measures to reduce the pressure to extend new credits to E.P.U. members. A part of the programme was to restrict imports from dollar areas and divert imports to E.P.U. countries. At the same time, an effort was being made to divert exports from E.P.U. countries to the dollar area thus bringing trade with the E.P.U. into better balance. On September 10 import restrictions had been placed against dollar area goods which had not previously been under restrictions, and in other cases the policy in granting licences had been made much more stringent. It was understood the objective was to bring about a saving of about $60 million per year on imports from Canada and the United States. Of this amount, about $10 million would fall against Canada and the remainder against the United States. Total Canadian exports to Belgium in 1950 were $66 million and Belgium was the third largest market for Canadian exports. There had been some protests already from Canadian firms that had met with refusals of licences.

Article XII of G.A.T.T. provided for the imposition of import restrictions in an emergency situation. It did not, however, appear that Belgian reserves were seriously threatened. In any event there was an obligation to consult before restrictions were imposed. In view of this, a strong informal protest to the head of the Belgian delegation to G.A.T.T. had been made. Mr. Isbister had now reported that the matter would be coming up for discussion on October 18 and that the United States had asked whether the Canadian delegation would take the lead along the lines of a memorandum that the U.S. authorities had approved. The memorandum set out five points:

(1) Belgian import restrictions on balance of payments grounds were contrary to Article XII of the G.A.T.T. and Belgium should have obtained prior approval.

(2) Even if Belgium contended that the controls were placed under Article 14 of the Monetary Fund, the United States would claim that the controls violated Article XII of the G.A.T.T.

(3) The United States had asked the Belgians for consultation under Article XII and that the lead should be taken by the Belgians to bring this question into G.A.T.T.

(4) On the basis of available evidence, the United States contended that Belgium had not any balance of payments difficulties and as such should not have imposed the import controls.

(5) The United States did not believe that it was necessary to impose the import controls in order to correct the E.P.U. problem facing Belgium. In other words, they claimed there was no conflict between E.P.U. and G.A.T.T.

United Kingdom officials had indicated they considered the Belgian restrictions to be essential for the preservation of E.P.U. and would oppose their lifting.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum, International Trade Relations Branch, Department of Trade and Commerce, October 16, 1951)†

2. The Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada pointed out that, in so far as the Belgian government was confronted by an emergency, it was in terms of foreign exchange policy rather than trade policy. To a large extent difficulties were arising out of capital movements and the restrictive measures would not help curtail those. Apart from other action that might be available to the Belgian government, an alternative solution was for the United States to finance Belgian credits through E.C.A. It was, however, an easier course for the United States to have the Belgians carry on with the restriction policy and it was apparent that the United Kingdom would prefer to have them meet their difficulties along the lines they had adopted rather than have E.C.A. step in.

3. The Chairman said that, so far as action by the Canadian delegation was concerned, he thought it should not be based too strictly on the legal obligations imposed by G.A.T.T. The political and financial embarrassments of the countries of the E.P.U. were very great at the present time and should not be regarded from too narrow an emphasis on the terms of G.A.T.T. Any representations by Canada should be based more specifically on the practical effects of the restrictions on Canadian trade. The line suggested in Telegram No. 77 of October 15 from the Canadian representative to O.E.E.C. seemed appropriate. The United States was the only country really in a position, as the underwriter of E.P.U., to take the action that would permit an alternative solution. It was apparent that another look should be had at the adequacy of the resources of E.P.U. In instructions to the Canadian delegation at Geneva, it would be important to emphasize that they should not get into the position of appearing to launch an extra-European attack on E.P.U. solutions of the problems confronting it. The line should rather be that Canada did not deny the existence of the problem or its magnitude but that we did not wish to see solutions adopted that would place in jeopardy such international arrangements as it had been possible to reach. In short, we felt that the G.A.T.T. scheme of rules was worth trying to preserve but that this would not be possible unless it could be demonstrated that all countries were attempting to have regard for its obligations.

4. Mr. Deutsch said that in discussion of the matter in Paris, which led to the views expressed in the telegram of October 15, it had been considered that too much emphasis should not be placed on the technical position under G.A.T.T. but that, at the same time, the proper course for the Belgian government was to place its affairs in order under the Agreement by withdrawing the restrictions and thereafter consulting as provided. The measures themselves were not at all adequate to meet the real Belgian problem. The $60 million reduction of dollar imports was quantitatively too little and the restrictions offered no help in stemming the capital inflow. The measures were likely to accomplish only the confusion of trade relations and the embarrassment of future handling of similar problems. It had to be recognized that the whole position of E.P.U. was being affected by the re-armament programme. The economic situation in France was critical: inflation was severe and there was a real crisis of confidence. So far as action at Geneva was concerned, it seemed undesirable that Canada should take the lead alone. It would be preferable if there could be a joint approach with the United States.

5. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said he thought it was important that some action should be taken by Canada. Canadian manufacturers and exporters who had been injured by Belgian action would expect that the government should not remain passive. On consideration it had seemed desirable to direct the delegation that in order of preference the best courses appeared to be: to try to persuade the Belgian delegation itself to raise the question of dollar restrictions; failing that to persuade the U.S. delegation to take the lead in view of their relatively greater interest in the restrictions and their responsibility for O.E.E.C. and E.P.U.; and, failing that to try to arrange for a joint U.S.-Canada approach. If none of these three courses was practicable, as a last resort the delegation should raise the matter on the ground of the substantial damage that would result to Canadian trade and the difficulty of getting support for G.A.T.T. in Canada if violations by other countries were allowed. There seemed to be some possibility that the Belgian delegation might be persuaded to make the running itself and that would be much the best solution.

6. Mr. Griffin suggested that there might be advantage in simultaneously discussing the matter with the Belgian Embassy in Ottawa to explain the Canadian position.

7. The Committee after further discussion, agreed that instructions be sent to the Canadian delegation at Geneva along the lines developed in the discussion and in accordance with the order of preference suggested by the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce; the Belgian Embassy in Ottawa to be informed of the position being taken.

Following for Isbister, Begins: Reference your No. 117, October 17,† Belgian import restrictions. Yours instructions are as follows:

1. Belgium should be asked to remove its dollar restrictions prior to a consultation with the Contracting Parties under the G.A.T.T. articles.

2. If possible, have the Belgians raise the question of dollar restrictions themselves; thus Canada would not be placed in the position of initiating the first move in the attack on the Belgian position.

3. If the Belgians will not raise the matter, discuss with the United States the possibility of their taking the initiative in view of their relatively greater interest in the restrictions, and their responsibility for, O.E.E.C. and the E.P.U.

4. If the United States is unwilling to take the initiative alone, the possibility of a joint Canadian-United States approach should be considered.

5. If, and only if, the first three approaches are not practicable, Canada should, with the support of United States, raise the issue in view of:

(a) The substantial damage threatening to Canadian trade;

(b) Our problem of selling G.A.T.T. to Canadian businessmen if we take no action when, in our opinion, other countries flagrantly violate it;

(c) If we overlook violations by any one country we weaken our position against other violators.

6. Your argument should follow the lines of paragraph 4, message 77, from Canadian representative O.E.E.C., Paris, repeated to you October 15.

7. We see danger in paragraph 3 of your 116 of October 16 of Canada being jockeyed into position of apparently torpedoing E.P.U. This inference must be disclaimed. Otherwise, we have no objection to the U.S. five points listed in your paragraph 2 of No. 116.

OEEC approved the interim arrangements for settlement of Bleu's surplus in EPU to December 31st. The managing board was instructed to submit as soon as possible proposals for the settlement of any surplus after December 31st.

2. We stated that while we hoped a satisfactory solution would be obtained, nevertheless we regretted that the settlement was based upon certain assumptions outlined in the managing board's report with which we had to take strong exception. The report pleaded in several places with member countries to avoid "any derogation from the principle of liberalisation" but suggested firm and resolute action by Belgium to restrict dollar imports in order to permit increased imports from its EPU partners. We stated that Canadian exporters and the Canadian Government were greatly concerned at the effects of those measures already taken by Belgium, that in our opinion their imposition should have required prior consultation with GATT, and that the Canadian Government would be consulting with Belgium on this matter. We indicated that our statement was for the record as we were concerned at this feature of the overall plan which had received the approval of the managing board.

3. In discussion with the Belgian delegation before we made our statement, they indicated that they had no objections to the statement and said that ECA had forced them to impose dollar restrictions. The ECA representative was unhappy about our proposed intervention but denied that they had suggested the dollar restrictions to Belgium, or had approved them.

4. Three replies were made to our statement. The United Kingdom representative declared that Belgium had been obliged to institute these measures in order to protect her reserves of dollars. He made no mention of managing board's report. The United States representative confined himself to stating that all countries had the problem of commitments in different international organizations and that these problems would have to be considered in the organizations concerned. The Belgian declared that they intended to respect the spirit and letter of their international obligations and if conflicts arose they would have to be resolved.

II. BELGIAN IMPORT RESTRICTIONS; DISCUSSION AT G.A.T.T.; POSSIBLE ACTION

3. Mr. Isbister said that, on the basis of instructions from Ottawa, vigorous representations had been made to the Belgian delegation about the import restrictions that had been introduced. It had been argued that Belgium was not in balance of payments difficulties and that the dollar-saving measures were not necessary to meet the difficulties that E.P.U. was experiencing. It had been pointed out that the problem was not one of a drain of dollars out of the E.P.U. but of an imbalance among participants in E.P.U. In the end, the Belgians admitted that they were not in balance of payments difficulties themselves nor were their reserves threatened. These were the only conditions that would justify import restrictions under G.A.T.T. However, the Belgian position was that the measures were exchange restrictions allowable under Article XV(9) which provided that nothing in the Agreement should preclude the use by a Contracting Party of exchange restrictions in accordance with the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund. Question then arose as to whether an enquiry should be directed from G.A.T.T. to the Fund as to the justification of the measures. None were, in fact sent, because it was doubted whether that was an appropriate way to proceed.

There appeared to be three courses open if further action was to be taken: to raise the question in the Fund; to pursue the matter in G.A.T.T.; or to discuss the question directly with Belgium through diplomatic channels. So far as action in the Fund was concerned, it would be important to know the U.S. position first. Under G.A.T.T. a complaint could be laid on the basis of nullification and impairment and, if supported, retaliatory action might be approved. It was doubtful, however, whether such action would get rid of the Belgian restrictions.

Copies of the Canadian statement and a summary of discussion on the Belgian restrictions at the meeting of G.A.T.T. had been circulated.

4. Mr. Rasminsky said that there were several difficulties to be considered in relation to any possible action in the Fund. If the matter was brought under discussion there it would get bound up in a maze of technicalities. The first question would be whether the measures were exchange restrictions or import restrictions. Belgium took the former position but the United Kingdom had previously argued that restrictions of this character were import restrictions in order to keep them out of the Fund. Assuming that the measures were ruled to be exchange restrictions, the next question would be whether they were justified. Article XIV of the Fund allowed the continuation of restrictions in effect at the time the Fund agreement was entered into. Such restrictions could be adapted to changing circumstances and, in the case of countries that had suffered enemy occupation, new restrictions could be introduced. It seemed apparent from the Article and its background that Belgium would have a good opening case under Article XIV.

So far as the Canadian position was concerned, our action in 1947, when special exchange conservation measures had been required, would be an embarrassment. We had been prepared to argue at that time, although the record made no mention of the point having been brought up in the formal discussions, that our restrictions were justifiable under Article XIV.

Altogether it was not clear that a favourable decision would be gained in the Fund. If it was gained, it would be a narrow thing and it would be supported by a minority of the executive directors. It seemed probable that the executive directors of the United States (with 35% of votes), Nationalist China and Yugoslavia would be on the side we favoured. On the other side, there might well be the United Kingdom, the rest of the sterling area, all western European countries and probably the Latin American countries. It would not be an impressive demonstration. Finally it was not certain that we would gain much by the decision. There would be no automatic consequences apart from the formal loss of access by Belgium to Fund resources.

4. The Chairman said he thought the position as expounded by Mr. Rasminsky was an almost conclusive argument against action in the Fund.

5. The Deputy Minister of Finance said he thought there was much to be said for deferring action. The recently announced measures in the United Kingdom would affect the position and it was possible that France might find it necessary to take new steps. He enquired whether there was any evidence that Belgium was moving to give up its liberal attitude in trade generally.

6. Mr. Isbister said that they had formed a strong opinion to the contrary at Geneva. It appeared that the Belgian action had been taken in response to pressure from other countries of E.P.U. It was possible that the Belgians would welcome a decision that their measures were not justified either under G.A.T.T. or the Fund. It had to be recognized that Belgium was vulnerable to restrictions that might be imposed by the United Kingdom, France and other E.P.U. countries. To a large extent it seemed to be a matter of affording protection to other E.P.U. exporters. Belgium was a market where the United Kingdom and other countries were meeting dollar competition.

7. Mr. Reisman said that it was doubtful whether the restrictions thus far introduced represented the full measure of action that might be taken by Belgium if outside pressure continued. A threat to take action in the Fund might move the United Kingdom to take its pressure off. The sterling area position in Fund discussion might not be entirely consistent in view of previous positions to the effect that measures of the Belgian variety were not exchange but trade restrictions. Debate in the Fund might be embarrassing to them.

8. Mr. Deutsch expressed the view that the best approach might be to communicate with the Belgian government, preferably in association with the United States, as a first step under the terms of Article XXIII of G.A.T.T. This could be done without any commitment to take retaliation and with reservation of all rights under the Agreement and the Fund. Such an approach might produce results. If not, it would at least give some further time.

The Belgian measures were simply one small symptom of a general inflationary problem in Europe. For that reason, it seemed somewhat out of proportion to concentrate too much attention on them specifically. The overall external positions of the United Kingdom and France were out of balance. It was not simply one particular corner that was disjointed.

9. Mr. Rasminsky said that as far as E.P.U. was concerned, the immediate difficulty was that the large quota holders, the United Kingdom and France, had moved out of their surplus position and were going into the first and second tranches of the deficit position. The surplus was being concentrated on Belgium and E.P.U. was being run out of dollars and gold.

10. Mr. Isbister said he thought that we would now see quite a strong effort toward a more watertight European protective system. The United Kingdom had given a strong impulse with its new measures. All E.P.U. countries would be faced with severe cuts in their exports to the United Kingdom and there might be a rapid crystallization of protectionist sympathy.

11. The Committee, after considerable discussion, agreed that a note be drafted and discussed with the U.S. authorities with a view to possible concurrent representations to the Belgian government, under Article XXIII of G.A.T.T., that injury had been caused by recent Belgian restrictions and seeking their removal.

BELGIAN RESTRICTIONS AGAINST DOLLAR IMPORTS

At an Interdepartmental Committee meeting on December 4 it was agreed that you be instructed to present to the Belgian Government a note of protest against the recent imposition of restrictions against imports from dollar countries.

2. As the United States Government was intending to deliver a similar note, it seemed advisable to achieve some degree of co-ordination in the timing of the presentation of our respective notes. We informed Washington that we were anxious to get our note in first, and the officials concerned with this issue in the State Department had no objection to this procedural arrangement provided too long an interval were not allowed to elapse between the presentation of the two notes.

3. As soon as we hear from Washington regarding date when the United States Government proposes to hand its note to the Belgians, we shall send you final instructions as to the time of presentation. In the meantime, we are transmitting to you the text of the proposed note by air. A follow-up cable instructing you to proceed with the presentation of the note will suffice.

4. Following is text of note: Text begins:

(1) Excellency,

I have the honour to refer to the close and friendly commercial relations that have always existed between the Governments of Canada and Belgium. In this regard I have been instructed by my Government to make representations to the Belgian Government concerning certain restrictions recently imposed in Belgium on imports from dollar countries.

(2) At the Sixth Session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which was held recently in Geneva, it was made clear that the Canadian Government takes a serious view of these restrictive measures. In the interval which has elapsed since that conference, the Canadian Government has given this matter further consideration. It has not been able to find grounds for modifying its position and notes with regret that the Belgian Government has not yet found it possible to remove the restrictions. These measures continue to be the subject of numerous complaints from Canadian industry and trade, and it is increasingly difficult to provide a reasonable or convincing explanation of their retention in the light of the international agreements to which both Governments are parties.

(3) The Government of Canada has taken a sympathetic and constructive interest in the reconstruction, integration and defence of Western Europe since the end of the war. This constructive interest has taken the form of substantial credits to promote post-war recovery and, more recently, of direct assistance to the common defence effort. The Canadian Government recognizes that Belgium is confronted at present with real and pressing difficulties arising out of its heavy surplus position with the European Payments Union but continues to believe that dollar import restrictions are neither a necessary nor an effective feature of any constructive programme to meet the underlying difficulties.

(4) The Canadian Government is concerned over the impact which the Belgian restrictions may have on the broad international programme to establish a viable system of multilateral trade and payments. The Belgian Government has been in the lead amongst the countries pressing for the elimination of barriers to world trade and the Government of Canada was gratified to receive assurances in Geneva that there were no grounds for assuming that the Government of Belgium had altered the fundamentals of its commercial policy.

(5) The Belgian import restrictions are certain to have an adverse influence on the development of the General Agreement and the International Monetary Fund as effective instruments for the liberalization of world trade and payments. It was with the utmost reluctance that the Canadian Government felt compelled to question these import restrictions under the General Agreement. It is hoped that their speedy removal will make it unnecessary for the matter to be pursued further under the General Agreement or in the International Monetary Fund.

(6) The Canadian Government is anxious to see the further development of satisfactory trade relations between Belgium and Canada within the framework of world trade liberalization for which both countries have been striving. To this end, it is hoped that the Belgian Government will see its way clear to remove the present import restrictions against dollar goods without delay. The Canadian Government firmly believes that such action would be in the interests of both countries and would also serve to strengthen international economic co-operation.

I have the honour to be. Text ends.[12]

BELGIAN IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

1. On receiving note yesterday, Minister of External Commerce said Belgium had been reluctant to impose restrictions;

(a) because of the cordial relations which had always (remained ?) intimate between our two countries and Belgium owed so much to Canada and

(b) because such action was directly contrary to the Belgian policy of free and unrestricted enterprise.

2. But the National Bank had task of defending the franc and the Belgian public always had had long and bitter experience of inflation. A government which tolerated a threat to the purchasing power of the national currency would be swept from office within twenty-four hours.

3. Their excess credit was now in neighbourhood of 18 milliards and was increasing at a rate of 8 milliards a quarter. Drastic action was imperative. The wrecking of Belgian economy would be an ill wind that would do no one any good. Actually the position had passed beyond the capacity allowed the bank and the Treasury was now unconstitutionally carrying the load not only for Belgium but for Luxembourg as well.

4. The government had staked its life on the Schuman Plan and would do likewise with regard to the European Army but as regards to the danger of inflation they could only cry now possumus.

5. He undertook to have the note carefully studied and reply made in due course. His earnest sincerity was beyond any shadow of doubt.

I am attaching a copy of a note which I dictated yesterday on the conversations with M. Pleven which took place in your office last Saturday morning.

It is, I realize, incomplete but I hope it is not inaccurate.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Rapport des conversations avec Monsieur Pleven

Record of Conversations with Monsieur Pleven

On Saturday morning, February 3, the Prime Minister received M. Pleven. Mr. St. Laurent had with him Mr. Howe, Mr. Claxton and Mr. Pearson (who was accompanied by the Under-Secretary). M. Pleven was accompanied by the French Secretary-General and the French Ambassador.

2. The conversation which ensued was informal and exceedingly friendly. After expressing once more his pleasure at being in Ottawa and remarking, as he had done the previous evening at the Government dinner, upon the remarkable extent to which French and Canadian views coincided on the most important world problems, the French Premier raised the following particular subjects:

The Threat of Inflation

3. In M. Pleven's opinion, the greatest single danger presently threatening Europe was that of rising prices. This was a threat at least comparable to that represented by Soviet military forces in the East; indeed it was part of the communist danger, perhaps the "secret weapon" which we had most to fear and which communist machinations would do their utmost to exploit.

4. France, after an exceedingly difficult post-war period and, with the help of the Marshall Plan, had, before Korea, succeeded in creating a situation of stability.

Prices and wages had been settled into a reasonably satisfactory relationship and at a tolerable level. The same had been true of Western Europe generally. They had regained their feet and, had it not been for the events of the past few months, recovery was well on its way to being accomplished.

5. With the United Nations defeat in Korea and the consequent acceleration of defence preparations of all kinds, the recovery of the civilian economy was threatened by a situation in which essential raw materials were in short supply; prices were skyrocketing as a result and, unless drastic action were taken (and such action could only be by international means, i.e. by international allocations) the rearmament programme itself would fail of accomplishment and the communist parties within Western Europe would be presented with opportunities for subversion and dislocation which might well result in the frustration of North Atlantic plans for the defence of the West.

6. M. Pleven gave the greatest emphasis to his observations on this question and argued that, for suppliers as well as consumers, international control and allocation of the essential raw materials in short supply was the only possible solution. He urged the Canadian Ministers to support this point of view in international discussions.

7. Mr. Howe expressed general agreement with the necessity for establishing international allocations for essential materials. There were obviously, however, serious difficulties in the way of a workable system. The Prime Minister remarked that, domestically, we were hoping to avoid the imposition of wide-spread controls over the economy, at least until we had seen how the United States fared in their efforts. We were naturally affected directly by what was done in that country.

North Atlantic Treaty Organization

8. Mr. Claxton enquired of M. Pleven what the French attitude was toward the relations of Spain, Greece and Turkey with NATO.

9. In reply, M. Pleven said that so far as Greece and Turkey were concerned, the present association of these countries with NATO in military planning seemed to be satisfactory; French military authorities felt that there was no need to improve upon them for the present; joint planning at the military level was going forward quite adequately.

10. With respect to Spain, M. Pleven hoped that France would not be faced in the near future by an open proposal for that country's inclusion in the alliance. Such a proposition at this time would cause serious division within France because of the extreme views held by the enemies and friends of Franco. If the move to include Spain were deferred until after the French general election, and if it were preceded by proper diplomatic preparation, the situation would be different. But to introduce the subject openly and at once (as the U.S. proposals for West German rearmament had been introduced in September) would cause most serious division within France and would present the French communists with a powerful weapon which they could use effectively and would use ruthlessly against French association with NATO itself.

11. Mr. St. Laurent remarked that apart from a few extremists on both sides, the subject of Spain's relationship with NATO was not of serious political importance in Canada. If given time it was likely that the Canadian people would accept Spanish adherence to the alliance without very much serious criticism.

12. M. Pleven added that in present circumstances Spanish divisions in any event would be a somewhat doubtful asset; in due course, no doubt, but not now.

13. M. Pleven was asked what he thought of the suggestion that NATO headquarters should be concentrated in Paris, and in particular whether he felt that the Council of Deputies and the new Defence Production Board should be moved from London; was this of importance from the French point of view? M. Pleven replied that the French Government, while not pressing for these moves, did feel that it would be advantageous, politically and practically, to have NATO concentrated on the continent of Europe, i.e. in Paris. What was the Canadian attitude?

14. Mr. Pearson and Mr. Heeney replied that, while the Government had not yet reached any firm decision, we were impressed by the political advantage of a French headquarters and a concentration of all NATO activities (other than those of the Standing Group and the Military Representatives Committee which had to be in Washington).

15. M. Pleven and M. Parodi both said that they would be able to provide the physical facilities if it were decided to locate the Deputies and the Defence Production Board in Paris. They added that it would be an advantage, they thought, for these bodies to be near SHAPE.

French Electoral Reform

16. M. Pleven said that as soon as he got back to Paris he would be engaged in a political struggle which might mean the fall of his Government. The subject was that of electoral reform. He was determined to fight this issue through before the general election, and through to a conclusion. The present system presented the communists with great advantages and inevitably led to the dividing of the anti-communist vote. For this reason he would brook no delay in dealing with the issue; it would have to be settled before an appeal to the people.

Other Matters

17. A number of other subjects were touched upon including Korea and the United Nations, the situation in the Far East, specifically Indo-China, and the prospects for increased Franco-Canadian trade. In reference to the last, M. Pleven enquired about a meeting of the Franco-Canadian Committee. Mr. St. Laurent said that he understood that a meeting had been fixed for May.

18. On these subjects nothing much, however, was added to what we already knew of the French attitude. M. Pleven's account of his conversations with President Truman tallied with that which we had had from our Embassy in Washington but without as much detail.

19. M. Pleven realized that the cost of maintaining North American forces in Europe was greater than the cost of maintaining troops from Western European countries. Nevertheless, he was glad to know from the Prime Minister and Mr. Claxton that the Canadian Government expected to have Canadian forces serve with the NATO integrated forces in Europe. He was glad to know too that Canada would be represented by an observer at the meeting to be held in Paris on February 15 to work out arrangements for a European army. To this meeting the French Government attached great importance.

CANADA-FRANCE TRADE TALKS

1. These talks ended yesterday afternoon (Thursday) after five very satisfactory meetings. Minutes† will be sent to you as soon as completed. A press statement was agreed upon for release here 10:00 p.m. tonight and in France for Saturday morning papers. The text in France will differ slightly. The Canadian text is as follows. Text begins:

The Secretary of State for External Affairs announced today the successful conclusion of the three-day meetings of Canadian and French delegations on trade and financial matters.

The delegations reviewed together the recent trends of trade and balances of payments between the two countries and noted with satisfaction that a better balance was developing in the trade situation especially as a result of recent increases in French exports to Canada. The possibilities of increasing normal trade in both directions were explored, and the French delegation explained that they were making special efforts to meet Canadian import requirements by means of trade missions, market surveys, and other means.

Special attention was paid to the satisfactory trade agreement recently reached between the two countries during the recent multilateral tariff negotiations at Torquay, and there was a preliminary exchange of views as to the possibility, at some appropriate time in the future, of further tariff negotiations between the two countries.

In connection with the general aim of increased trade between the two countries, which is facilitated by tariff reductions, the Canadian delegation noted with pleasure that, only last week, the French Government had been able to relax its restrictions against imports from Canada by allowing their own exporters to dollar areas to use a substantially greater part of their dollar earnings for purchases from those areas.

A suggestion was put forward, and welcomed by both sides, that trade might be further encouraged by a group to be formed by leading French and Canadian exporters. This possibility is being explored immediately.

There was detailed discussion of the possibilities of further trade in scarce commodities. The French delegation were anxious to obtain larger supplies of base metals and forest products from Canada especially pulp and paper. Similarly the Canadian side explored the possibility of obtaining more steel and other products from France and French overseas territories.[13]

Discussions were held which are expected to facilitate the release of those French assets which still remain vested in the Canadian Custodian.

The conversations took place in a most cordial atmosphere. The following officials took part. The delegation from France was led by Mr. Pierre Charpentier, Director-General of Economic Affairs, Ministry of Foreign Affairs. It also included Mr. Gibert, Director of the Ministry of Economic Affairs, Mr. Bizard, Inspector of Finance, Mr. Plandin, Ministry of Economic Affairs, Mr. Bulteau, Ministry of Industry and Commerce, and Mr. Dauge, Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The Canadian delegation was led by Mr. W.F. Bull, Deputy Minister of Trade & Commerce, assisted by Mr. Denis Harvey and Mr. C.M. Isbister of the same Department. It also included Mr. John Deutsch, Director, International Economic Relations Division, Department of Finance, and Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre, Head of the Economic Division, Department of External Affairs.

Further discussions will take place as required to continue and extend the useful work already done. Text Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, June 7, 1951

Dear Claude [Isbister]:

CANADA-FRANCE TRADE TALKS

I was talking to Laboulaye yesterday about these talks. He thought that they had been very useful but perhaps had left behind them less in the way of tangible results and specific guidance for officials than they might have done. After talking the matter over with him I am inclined to agree, at any rate on one point.

2. You will remember that, at your suggestion, a week or so before the meetings I discouraged him from expecting from our side any particular list of commodities in which Canada had a special interest. This in turn led him to discourage his own side from putting forward specific lists of proposed exports (and imports?) together with target quantities for the coming year. It was, I think, agreed in the final meeting that some such lists might be exchanged subsequently.

3. Laboulaye's point was this. The French side are by now perfectly aware that they are not undertaking bilateral negotiations with us on a "trade and payments" basis. There would, therefore, have been no real danger in putting into the meeting lists of commodities with target amounts attached to them. Further, the introduction of such material into the meetings would have had two very specific advantages. In the first place they would have made the discussion considerably more pointed. In the second place, and more important, the French officials at any rate would have gone home with target amounts of scarce materials and other exports for Canada in mind. These would have been kept in mind during the course of subsequent "trade and payments" negotiations with other countries; a certain quantity of supplies would have been more or less "reserved" for Canada in the minds of French officials.

4. I think we might keep these matters in mind when approaching the next lot of trade talks with the French. (I am sending copies of this letter to Denis Harvey and John Deutsch).

Yours sincerely,
A.F.W. PLUMPTRE

FRANCE; MILITARY RELIEF CLAIM

15. The Minister of Finance said that two inter-governmental financial claims arising out of the war were outstanding between Canada and France. One was our claim on the government of France in respect of military relief totalling $13.4 million (U.S.). The other was the claim by the government of France totalling $1.15 million (Canadian) in respect of French vessels requisitioned by the Canadian government during the war. A settlement of these claims had been negotiated on the basis that the French claim would be offset against the Canadian military relief claim. Taking into account the long-term effects of the war on the French economy and various other factors, it had finally been agreed that the French government would deposit $7.5 million (U.S.) in French francs to the credit of the Canadian government from time to time as requested. Drawings on the franc account would be at the rate of $500,000 (U.S.) every six months to be used for a variety of purposes within France, such as Canadian government current expenditures in that country, the purchase or improvement of property for diplomatic and consular establishments, the purchase of furniture and furnishings in France for Canadian government establishments in France and elsewhere, any educational or cultural programmes which Canada might undertake in France, etc.

A settlement along these lines seemed satisfactory and was comparable to settlements negotiated with France by the United Kingdom and United States.

16. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved a settlement of the Canadian military relief claim against France and the French claim against Canada in respect of French vessels requisitioned during the war along the lines recommended by the Minister of Finance.[14]

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY: TERMINATION OF THE STATE OF WAR

Memorandum from Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet

TERMINATION OF THE STATE OF WAR WITH GERMANY

At its meeting of September 30, 1950, the Cabinet agreed to an announcement that the Canadian Government proposed to terminate the state of war with Germany as soon as it was in a position to do so. This announcement was made in the form of a press release on October 26, 1950.

2. The United Kingdom, the United States and France have proposed that action by various Allied countries to terminate the state of war should be taken at about the same time. The action to be taken by these powers has been deferred pending the enactment of legislation by the German Federal Republic to terminate the state of war in German law and thereby remove any disabilities to which Allied nationals may be subject in that country as a consequence of the state of war. The German legislation has now been enacted.

3. It is expected that the United Kingdom will take formal action to terminate the state of war early in the week of July 9, that the United States will, at about the same time, take the preliminary steps for Congressional action, and that the French Government will issue a decree on or about July 15. It will be proposed to other Allied Governments who have not already declared the termination of the state of war, to take simultaneous action. The Governments which have already declared termination of the state of war are Pakistan and India.

4. The Department of Justice has advised that the legal state of war with Germany may be terminated through exercise of the Royal Prerogative to declare war or peace by means of a Proclamation authorized by an Order-in-Council.

5. The Department of Justice further advises that from the point of view of Canadian municipal law there would appear to be no objection to terminating the state of war and it would not appear that the termination of the state of war will affect the operation of any federal statutes. The Department of Justice comments that termination of the state of war with Germany may have an effect on some outstanding contracts or under Provincial law. It can be presumed in respect of the last mentioned observation that the results would be those that are intended to occur when the state of war is, in fact, terminated. Insofar as pre-war German debts are concerned the German Government has given an undertaking to negotiate.

6. The termination of the state of war will not affect the legislation upon which the Custodian relies for the control of German assets and will not prejudice the position in respect of any claims for reparations or other claims against Germany arising out of the war.

7. The termination of the state of war will leave open the question of the revival of former treaties with Germany. The views of all Departments of Government in respect of treaties with Germany with which they are concerned are being sought. The extent to which particular treaties shall be revived or shall be regarded as terminated, will then be agreed in negotiation with the Federal Republic of Germany.

8. It is proposed that concurrently with the formal Proclamation of the termination of the state of war, a public statement will be made to the effect that the termination of the state of war will leave open the settlement of all outstanding questions with Germany arising out of the war which may be determined in a treaty of peace or by other agreements, with particular reference to reparations and the retention of German assets. This announcement will also make clear that the termination of the state of war does not affect in any way the Allied agreements and declarations regarding control machinery for Germany which have been made since the surrender of the German Reich.

9. All Departments of Government have been consulted and the reservations which it is proposed should be made as to the effect of the announcements are in accord with the recommendations received.

10. As soon as the state of war has been formally terminated, it is proposed that Canada should establish direct diplomatic relations with the Federal Republic of Germany. It is proposed that the Head of the Canadian Mission in Bonn, The Honourable T.C. Davis, K.C., now accredited to the Allied High Commission, should then be accredited as Canadian Ambassador to the Federal Republic of Germany.

11. I recommend that approval should now be given to termination of the state of war with Germany, the publication of a Proclamation to be made concurrently with the action to be taken by the other Allied Governments. If Cabinet agrees, submission to Council will be made accordingly for the issue of a Proclamation.[15] presiding at the meeting of the North Atlantic Council beginning in Rome on November 24th, 1951.[16]

It appeared that the Manitoba and British Columbia flood relief funds were not fully committed and that some measure of assistance might be provided from these sources. The Minister of Justice was taking up the matter with the Premier of Manitoba and an approach would be made to those concerned in British Columbia. It might be difficult for the government to make a direct contribution in this case since this might create a precedent which would make it difficult to resist future similar requests, particularly if they originated in one of the NATO countries. Should it become necessary for the government to consider providing assistance in the present case, any contribution would probably have to be made indirectly through some such organization as the Canadian Red Cross. There might, of course, be cases of disasters abroad — such as the present widespread starvation in Northern Greece — which were beyond the means of the country concerned to relieve and where direct contributions might be necessary. The present disaster, however, did not appear to come within this category.

12. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Prime Minister on the question of the provision of Canadian relief for victims of the Po Valley floods, and agreed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs be informed that:

(a) while it was not felt that the government would be able to make a direct contribution in this case, possibilities of indirect assistance were being investigated;

(b) at the same time, should one of the United Nations or North Atlantic Treaty bodies presently meeting in Europe recommend an international scheme for relief in Northern Italy, the government would be prepared to give it consideration.

RÉVISION DU TRAITÉ DE PAIX AVEC L'ITALIE
REVISION OF THE ITALIAN PEACE TREATY

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

REVISION OF THE ITALIAN PEACE TREATY

Italian pressure for revision of the Peace Treaty has been mounting steadily ever since Italy ranged herself along side the Western powers as a signatory of the North Atlantic Treaty. The impending conclusion of a Peace Treaty with Japan has revived the issue in an acute form. Italian sensibilities appear to have been offended by the failure of the United States to invite them to the Conference at San Francisco, despite the fact that Italy formally declared war on Japan in the closing days of hostilities. More important, however, is that fact that the substance of the proposed Japanese Treaty is much more favourable to the vanquished enemy than the existing treaty with Italy, particularly in that it contains no restrictive clauses such as those on limitation of armaments, or any provision for reparations. The situation has not been improved by the publication on the part of the Japanese Government of an official paper on August 3 drawing an invidious comparison between the two treaties.

2. With regard to Italian participation at San Francisco, the United States, with the concurrence of the United Kingdom, took the attitude that it would be inappropriate for an ex-enemy country to sign a multilateral treaty with Japan. Both Governments have however agreed to use their good offices to bring about a separate and mutually satisfactory settlement between Italy and Japan, and the Italian Government has apparently agreed to this procedure. The underlying motive on the part of the United States and the United Kingdom in adopting this position is probably the desire to avoid giving the Italians an even better propaganda point than they now have in favour of revision of the Italian Treaty, if they were to be associated on an equal basis with the other victorious powers in a more liberal settlement with Japan than the one to which they themselves are subject.

See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1951, 2nd Session, Volume II, p. 1351.

3. Reports from Rome indicate that the new Italian Cabinet will make revision of the Treaty a cornerstone of its foreign policy. Premier de Gasperi stated in the Italian Senate on July 31 that "the intrinsic logic both of the Atlantic Alliance and of international collaboration should lead to the scrapping of a Treaty which was conceived and imposed as a sanction of war".

The Case for Revision

4. Exploiting to the full the favourable situation created by the negotiations for a Japanese Peace Treaty, the Italian Government in mid-July, made formal approaches to the governments of the United Kingdom, United States and France with a view to the revision of the Italian Peace Treaty. The Italian memoranda to the governments concerned argued that the Treaty had been rendered obsolete by political events. The clauses on Trieste, as the three Western powers stated in their declaration of March 20, 1948, cannot be enforced, and the admission of Italy to the United Nations specifically envisaged in the Treaty cannot be realized because of the Soviet veto. Italy has taken her share of responsibility for the defence of the peace-loving nations, and the restrictions on her armed forces are inconsistent with her position as a member of the North Atlantic Treaty. The Italian memoranda pointed out that the projected treaty between the Western powers and Japan has been conceived in an entirely different spirit from that of the Italian Peace Treaty, a circumstance which, in the opinion of the Italian Government, makes the Italian Peace Treaty even more obsolete and its revision a matter of even greater urgency. The Italian démarche concluded by asking for an international initiative to render the clauses of the Italian Peace Treaty consistent with present political realities.

Obstacles to Revision

5. The Italian Government's desire to have the stigma of the Treaty removed is understandable and would appear justified on broad political grounds. It merits careful consideration if for no other reason than to enable Italy to play her full part in NATO. The Italian position will become even more anomalous if, in the near future, a settlement is worked out between the Western Powers and the Federal German Republic on terms more favourable than those of the Italian Peace Treaty.

6. On the other hand, from a strictly Canadian point of view, any proposal for the revising or scrapping of the Treaty would have to be weighed against its effect on the outstanding question of the disposition of Italian assets in Canada and the settlement of Canadian war claims, if this problem (now nearing a solution) has not been resolved. There are, in addition, certain obstacles to revision which cannot be disregarded:

(1) Any substantial revision of the military clauses of the Italian Treaty would tend to undermine the position of the Western powers in challenging known infringements by the Balkan satellites of their respective peace treaties.

(2) Formal revision of the Treaty, requiring the concurrence of all the signatory powers, is most unlikely to be achieved since it would require Soviet consent. Any steps taken by the Western powers to modify the terms of the treaty would presumably have to be confined to unilateral declarations of intent.

(3) Revision of the Peace Treaty would revive the question of the final disposition of Trieste and would present special difficulties. By the terms of the Italian Peace Treaty the Free Territory of Trieste was to be created and its integrity and independence entrusted to the Security Council. Pending the appointment of a Governor acceptable to both the Soviet Union and the Western powers, the Permanent Statute for the Free Territory was to remain in abeyance, and the area thus continued under military occupation by the forces of the United Kingdom and United States (Zone A, including the City of Trieste) and Yugoslavia (Zone B). When repeated attempts to reach agreement on the appointment of a Governor had failed, the Western powers in a joint declaration of March 20, 1948, proposed to the Soviet Union the return to Italy of the Free Territory. The decision to admit that this section of the Italian Peace Treaty had become unworkable was prompted in part by a Western desire to influence the course of Italian elections which were then imminent. With the subsequent defection of Yugoslavia from the Cominform the March 1948 declaration has become a source of some embarrassment to the Western powers. Any attempt to implement its declared aim would have unfortunate repercussions on the increasingly friendly relations between Yugoslavia and the West; to withdraw the declaration would constitute a serious blow to the prestige of pro-Western elements in Italy. Under strong Italian pressure the declaration was, however, reaffirmed by the three powers in March 1951 but contained in addition a saving statement to the effect that Yugoslavia and Italy should attempt to reach a settlement through bilateral negotiations.

7. Recent information from Belgrade seems to indicate that Yugoslavia might be prepared to settle the Trieste issue on the basis of Zone A going to the Italians and Zone B to the Yugoslavs (with certain free-port facilities in Trieste) providing that outstanding Yugoslav reparations claims against Italy were also settled and that certain minor adjustments on ethnic grounds in the boundary line were made. If these conditions were agreed to by Italy, there are grounds for believing that Yugoslav opposition to revision of the Italian Peace Treaty would be substantially withdrawn. The Italians for their part may be disposed to negotiate a settlement in view of the possibility that the passage of time will tend to consolidate the existing temporary arrangements.

8. Because of the uncertainty concerning the Trieste issue, however, the United Kingdom considers that the Italian request for revision of the Peace Treaty could best be met by a declaration by the United Kingdom, United States and France which would indicate that in their relations with Italy they intend to be guided by the spirit of the Atlantic Alliance and that the three governments recognise in principle that Italy should enjoy the legitimate right of self-defence. To render a declaration of this nature more palatable to Yugoslavia, the United Kingdom has suggested to the United States and France that it should be counter-balanced by some attempt to ensure that a determined effort is simultaneously made by the Italians and Yugoslavs to settle the question of Trieste, and possibly by a declaration by Italy to the effect that once that question has been settled, no territorial issues would remain outstanding between the two countries.

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], September 13, 1951

PROPOSED REVISION OF THE ITALIAN PEACE TREATY

With a view to supplementing the memorandum of August 30[18] on Italian Peace Treaty revision which you took with you to San Francisco, Canada House was asked for any information that might be obtained on the current United Kingdom attitude on this subject. The Department has now received the attached despatch (No. 3748 of September 8, 1951)† enclosing a copy of a Foreign Office brief prepared for Mr. Morrison.

2. The United Kingdom proposal is to deal with the problem in two stages: a tripartite declaration of readiness to consider sympathetically a request for revision from the Italian Government (Annex A) to be followed by bilateral negotiations between Italy and friendly signatories, leading to formal revision.

3. Subsequent to the tripartite declaration and before formal steps are taken for revision of the Treaty, the United Kingdom hopes that Italy and Yugoslavia might patch up their differences over Trieste. This problem is the major obstacle in the way of Yugoslav agreement to revision and the United Kingdom feels that action should be avoided which would embarrass or antagonize Belgrade. The Americans, on the other hand, are apparently not so concerned as to the effect of revision of the Treaty on Tito's internal position. The Yugoslavs now appear ready to negotiate on the question of Trieste and the Italians have agreed to approach Belgrade on the promise that the Trieste elections will be postponed until the end of 1951. (The postponement has now been publicly announced.)

4. While it is not expressly stated in the United Kingdom memorandum, the inference is left that the completion of the second stage of the revision procedure would be dependent upon a satisfactory agreement on Trieste between the Italians and the Yugoslavs.

[18] Cette note est la même que le document précédent.
This memorandum is the same as the preceding document.

5. The United Kingdom memorandum also makes the following points:

(a) The contemplated revision of the Treaty would affect only the military clauses (Articles 46-70) and those of a general political nature (Articles 15-18). Revision would, therefore, appear to have no bearing upon Canadian war claims;

(b) Action for the revision of the Italian Treaty should not be associated with the question of Italian obligations under NATO, since this would fit in with the current Soviet propaganda against the Atlantic Alliance.

(c) There are a number of reasons why the U.S.S.R. might not take any positive action against Italy when formal revision of the Treaty has been negotiated with friendly powers. However, a series of counter moves are suggested in the event that Russia does embark upon a campaign of strong diplomatic pressure. Since the bilateral agreements on revision would be without prejudice to the rights of third parties, it could be claimed that any objections must be dealt with directly between the U.S.S.R. (and other dissentients) and Italy. The tactic then suggested is that the Western Powers counter every legal move that might be made by the Russians under Article 87 (the Disputes Article) of the Italian Treaty, by similar moves against Hungary, Roumania and Bulgaria with respect to violations of their peace treaties. (Annex B.)

6. Should Mr. De Gasperi approach you on the subject of Peace Treaty revision you might consider informing him that while Canada could hardly be expected to take the initiative on this subject, we are in sympathy with the Italian position. If the three powers whom Italy has already approached come forward with reasonable proposals we would certainly consider seriously associating ourselves with them. You might also consider making some reference to the desirability of a mutually satisfactory settlement of the Trieste issue in the near future, particularly in view of the strategic importance of co-operation between Italy and Yugoslavia at the present time.

7. Canada's association with the tripartite declaration of March 20, 1948 favouring the cession of the entire Trieste area to Italy may now be a source of embarrassment. If this subject is raised, it might be pointed out that in practical terms it would be virtually impossible to implement this declaration in the forseeable future, and that any real attempt along these lines would only serve to divide the forces opposed to Soviet imperialism. The best hope — in fact the only genuine solution — would therefore seem to be a negotiated settlement between Italy and Yugoslavia.

8. I am attaching an extra copy of this memorandum and the United Kingdom brief in the event that you feel it would be useful to the Prime Minister in any conversation he may have with Mr. De Gasperi.

PROPOSED REVISION OF THE ITALIAN PEACE TREATY

As was anticipated the proposed revision of the Italian Peace Treaty was considered on September 13th at a meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the United Kingdom, the United States and France in Washington. General agreement was reached that the Italians have a good case for the revision of their Peace Treaty on the grounds that they can scarcely be left in a worse position than Japan is now or Germany will be after the proposed "contractual relationship" is established. The United Kingdom proposed that revision of the Italian Treaty should be approached in two stages: a tripartite declaration (U.S., U.K., France) expressing willingness to consider an Italian request for revision; to be followed by formal revision of the Treaty on the basis of bilateral agreements between Italy and friendly signatories. In the United Kingdom view the Italians should address a note to all signatories following the tripartite declaration and the bilateral agreements entered into with friendly signatories providing for the non-enforcement of certain specified articles should be without prejudice to the rights of third parties.

In accordance with the United Kingdom proposal Italy should attempt to negotiate a settlement of the Trieste issue with Yugoslavia following the tripartite declaration and before formal revision is effected. The United States and France have agreed on the procedure proposed by the United Kingdom although Mr. Acheson attached the condition, which was accepted, that revision of the military and political clauses of the Treaty should not be held up even if there is no concurrent agreement between the Yugoslav and Italian Governments on the question of Trieste.

It is understood that the question of the revision of the Italian Treaty will be the subject of discussion between Messrs. Acheson, Morrison and Schuman and Premier De Gasperi in Ottawa during the current week. (Secret).

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], December 14, 1951

ITALIAN PEACE TREATY REVISION

You will recall that at your press conference on October 4 you indicated that the Canadian Government was in general agreement with the Tripartite Declaration of September 26 on the Italian Peace Treaty and that any approach from the Italian Government on this question would be given sympathetic consideration.

2. On December 8 the Italian Ambassador delivered the attached Note† to the Acting Under-Secretary proposing that the Government of Canada agree that the spirit reflected by the preamble of the Treaty no longer exists and has been replaced by the spirit of the United Nations Charter; that the political clauses of the Treaty are superfluous; and that the military clauses are not consistent with Italy's position as an equal member of the democratic and freedom-loving family of nations.

3. On December 10 the United Kingdom High Commissioner, the French Ambassador and Mr. Morgan of the United States Embassy called successively on the Department and delivered messages indicating the terms in which each of their governments proposed to reply to the Italian approach. As might be expected, these formulae are similar and simply agree with the operative paragraph of the Italian Note that the spirit of the preamble no longer exists, that the political articles are superfluous and that Italy should be released — as far as each of the governments is concerned — from the restrictive military clauses of the Treaty. One minor difference is that the French apparently do not intend to refer to the military clauses as such but simply to mention the appropriate articles in the Treaty.

4. According to the timetable agreed in Washington in early September by the Three Powers, Italian concurrence in the Note which they (the Italians) were to present was to be secured before the Tripartite Declaration. The Italians were, however, to be free to present the agreed Note as soon after the Tripartite Declaration as they wished. This was to be followed by diplomatic activity to secure, if possible, the support of doubtful signatories such as India, Pakistan, Ethiopia and Greece. It was also hoped that sufficient progress might have been made between the Italians and the Yugoslavs regarding Trieste to secure Yugoslav concurrence to the proposed revision. Some six weeks to two months after the Tripartite Declaration, the de facto revision was, according to the plan of the Three Powers, to be completed through a formal exchange of Notes.

5. As it turns out, there would appear to have been considerable delay in securing Italy's agreement on the exact terms of the Italian Note. Further, with the exception of Greece doubtful signatories have not given a public indication of their stand on the question of the revision. An annex† gives the position of the various signatories as far as is known. The present Italian Note, however, appears to be an improvement in several respects on the tripartite draft as originally planned. It represents a simpler approach, refrains from emphasizing the military aspects of the revision and does not attack the U.S.S.R. by name. In addition, the Three Powers do not now appear to favour a formal exchange of Notes with an Italian Note of acceptance agreeing that the correspondence should constitute a formal modification of the Treaty as far as the signatory in question is concerned. This has the advantage of carrying out a de facto revision of the Treaty with a minimum of pseudo-legal trappings.

6. In general, it would seem clear that there is no other course but for us to go along with the de facto revision. In the first place, the more liberal Japanese Treaty gives Italy a good moral claim for the removal of permanent discriminations in its Peace Treaty. Secondly, we would be put in a very invidious position vis-à-vis the Italians if we failed to go along with the twelve other "friendly signatories". This is particularly the case in view of our alliance with Italy in NATO, the Ottawa declaration of the NATO Council that all obstacles which hinder the co-operation on an equal footing among members should be removed, and your own indication to the press that an approach from the Italians would be treated sympathetically. Finally, the terms of the proposed exchange of Notes appear innocuous, and the procedure, in the opinion of the Legal Division, is designed to do least possible damage to the doctrine of the sanctity of treaties.

7. Some confusion has arisen over the question of the timing of the reply to the Italians. Although Clutterbuck's recent letter† stated that the three governments expected to make their replies on or about December 14, all signs now point to December 21 as the new suggested date. The recent American Note† indicated that the three governments expected to reply about two weeks after the presentation of the Italian Note (December 8)[19] and the United States Embassy has since been informed that the target date is December 21.[20] Earnscliffe has also now received word from London confirming this in general terms although indicating that there may be still some uncertainty as regards timing because of a possible linking of the question of Italian Peace Treaty revision with the vote in the Security Council regarding the admission of Italy to the United Nations. It is doubtful, however, that this issue will influence the prospective timetable, since the Soviet vote on Italian admission to the United Nations is unlikely to be affected seriously by the exchange of Notes and, in any event, the date of the Security Council action can undoubtedly be adjusted to suit the tactical requirements of the United Kingdom, the United States and France.

8. Unless you have serious objections, I would recommend that the Canadian reply to the Italians be couched in terms similar to the formula proposed by the Three Powers and that, assuming there is no change in the present timetable, our reply be delivered on or about December 21.[21] A suggested reply† is attached.

9. I would also recommend that the proposed Canadian reply to the Italians be noted[22] or approved by Cabinet. Although neither the press nor the public have shown any interest in the question of Italian Peace Treaty revision, and the U.S.S.R. has given no indication that it intends to make a major issue of the matter, it would seem that a de facto revision of a peace treaty with one of the major Axis Powers of the last war is an issue of sufficient substance to require clearance at the highest level.

ITALIAN PEACE TREATY; DE FACTO REVISION

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the Italian government, on a number of occasions, had expressed a desire for revision of the articles in the Italian Peace Treaty which involved permanent restrictions on Italy. On September 26th, 1951, the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France had declared readiness to give favourable consideration to the removal of such restrictions and discriminations. Formal revision of the Treaty was not possible owing to the opposition of Russia. In reply to notes from Italy to the various signatory governments, the United Kingdom, the United States and France had prepared notes which they intended to send forward about December 21st, agreeing that Italy should be released, so far as each of the governments was concerned, from the restrictive military clauses of the Treaty and certain political articles. It was recommended that a reply be sent on behalf of Canada in terms similar to those used in the notes by the three governments above and that communication of the reply be on or about December 21st.

(Departmental memorandum, undated)†.

8. The Minister of Finance mentioned that the Italian government had not shown any very great zeal in completing arrangements concerning Canadian claims in Italy.[23] It might be desirable to intimate to the Italian Ambassador that the transmission of the Canadian reply would have relation to Italian action on these claims.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 265-51 [Ottawa], October 11, 1951

LUMP-SUM SETTLEMENT OF WAR CLAIMS AGAINST ITALY AND RELEASE OF ITALIAN ASSETS HELD BY THE CANADIAN CUSTODIAN

On May 3, 1949, Cabinet approved a recommendation that negotiations be undertaken with Italy and other countries "to effect the best possible lump-sum settlement for the satisfaction of war claims and for the release of enemy assets".[24]

2. Cabinet agreed on May 2, 1950, that a continued effort be made by Canadian officials to negotiate a lump-sum settlement for Canadian war claims against Italy.[25]

3. Negotiations were first conducted with the Italian authorities in Ottawa and latterly through our Embassy in Rome. Various proposals and counter-proposals were submitted. In the beginning there was a wide gap between the amount offered by the Italians and that which the Canadian officials were willing to recommend for acceptance.

4. Last December we offered a settlement based on the payment of 725 million lire for all our war claims, with a few minor exceptions. The Italians contended that large portions of the Aluminium Company's claims were not eligible for compensation and made a counter offer of 460 million lire. We could not accept the Italian contention and submitted a revised offer whereby all the Aluminium Company claims would also be excluded from a lump-sum settlement and would be submitted with the other excepted claims separately to the Italians along lines provided for in the Peace Treaty. The amount of this offer was 290 million lire made up by deducting the Aluminium Company claims from 725 million lire and adding 38 million lire to account for new claims filed since December. We undertook to release Italian assets once agreement on our war claims had been reached. However, this release is a long process and it is our intention to retain at all times sufficient assets to cover all our claims until this lump-sum payment is ratified by the Italian Parliament.

5. The Italians linked their payment of $1,300,000 under the Military Relief Settlement reached in February, 1950, to the release of their assets and hence to the settlement of war claims. They said that it would be difficult for them to submit the Military Relief Settlement for ratification without having obtained agreement for the release of Italian assets held in Canada, but they have undertaken to submit both this present Agreement and the Military Relief Settlement to their Parliament at the same time, once arrangements are completed covering the release of their assets. Should there be any undue delay in the seeking of this ratification our Ambassador in Rome will be instructed to take the matter up with the appropriate authorities.

6. At the beginning of his stay in Ottawa for the N.A.T.O. Council meeting, Mr. De Gasperi had a talk with the Prime Minister and they agreed that steps should be taken to effect an early settlement of Canadian war claims and the release of Italian assets. At the same time word was received from Rome that the Italian Ministry of Foreign Affairs was agreeable to a settlement based on the payment of 290 million lire.

7. It was thought advisable to take advantage of Mr. De Gasperi's presence in Ottawa to complete an exchange of Notes with him embodying the proposals we had made. There was no opportunity to seek Cabinet approval of the details and, of course, the principle of a lump-sum settlement had already been approved. Therefore after consultation with the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State this exchange of Notes took place on September 20 and the Notes were signed by Mr. De Gasperi and myself, respectively.[26]

8. With the concurrence of the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State, I recommend that Cabinet approve the intergovernmental agreement entered into between Canada and Italy by this exchange of Notes which provides for the satisfaction of Canadian war claims, the payment of pre-war commercial debts owed to Canada and for the release of Italian assets vested in the Custodian, for the following reasons:

(a) It is politically desirable;

(b) Our claimants will receive satisfaction more quickly than if the relevant provisions of the Treaty of Peace with Italy had to be complied with;

(c) We will avoid many disputes before Conciliation Commissions and the costs thereof;

(d) The Military Relief Settlement will be presented for ratification.

[26] Voir Canada, Recueil des traités, 1952, N°. 21./See Canada, Treaty Series, 1952, No. 21.

9. I understand that the Ministers concerned will be requesting from Cabinet directives for the disposition of the lump-sum received in settlement and for the processing of the war claims affected by this Agreement.[27]

NORWEGIAN REQUEST FOR CANADIAN SUPPORT FOR INCREASED QUOTA UNDER THE INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

On April 24th Mr. Steen called on me and left the attached memorandum† containing a request that we support the Norwegian Government in its efforts to increase its guaranteed import quota under the International Wheat Agreement by 75,000 tons. The Norwegian Government can hope that its application will be granted only if Canada is prepared to guarantee to export the additional 75,000 tons annually for the next two years at wheat agreement prices.

2. Mr. Steen drew attention to the fact that, under its present trade agreement with the Soviet Union, Norway receives 75,000 tons of wheat in exchange for certain Norwegian products. As many of these are strategically important products, the Norwegian Government has undertaken to prevent their exportation to the Soviet Union. It is now faced with the difficulty that it will be unable to secure its wheat requirements from the Soviet Union.

3. In view of the Norwegian Government's exceptional cooperation, I thought you would wish us to do everything possible to meet her request. The Economic Division discussed the situation with Dr. Wilson of the Wheat and Grain Division of the Department of Trade and Commerce, who agreed to take it up with Mr. Howe and the Wheat Board.

4. I am attaching copies of Dr. Wilson's memorandum of May 5th to Mr. Howe and Mr. Howe's reply of May 7th. From Mr. Howe's memorandum it is evident that he is prepared to do everything possible to increase Norway's present allocation under the agreement. In his fourth paragraph he states: "It is true that this (the increased allocation) may net slightly less for the Canadian producers, but it seems to me that we have an over-riding responsibility to make countries such as Norway believe that it is worthwhile to trade with America rather than with Russia". In his last paragraph Mr. Howe states that "there is no doubt that External Affairs will press the Government to adopt the attitude I have outlined above, and I must say that I agree with External Affairs as to the desirability of this procedure."

5. Following Mr. Howe's directive, the matter is being taken up with the Wheat Board and perhaps with the United States authorities to see how the immediate request may be supported most effectively. Yesterday, Trade and Commerce wrote to us to say that, while some factors remain to be clarified, they hope that a final decision will be made well in advance of the June meeting of the International Wheat Council, and that they agreed that an interim reply might be given to the Norwegian Minister to the effect that we were making our "best endeavour to meet the Norwegian position".

6. The Wheat Board is expected to meet in Ottawa next week to give a definite decision on the extent to which we can increase Norway's quota.[28]

RE NORWEGIAN REQUEST FOR INCREASED INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT QUANTITY

External Affairs have given me the attached copy of Aide Mémoire† submitted by the Norwegian Minister on April 24th and have stressed the political merits of the Norwegian case. I am told that Mr. Pearson may wish to raise this question in Cabinet. The Norwegians have been encouraged not to renew their trade agreement with the USSR, which has in recent years furnished them with 75,000 tons of Russian wheat per year. This quantity the Norwegians are now seeking by way of an increase in their IWA quantity. External Affairs emphasize the role Norway is playing in the North Atlantic Treaty and urge that this request be met.

[28] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I agree that we should try to help Norway in this matter — but it will strengthen the hand of those who are opposing the agreement on the ground that the wheat grower is once again being asked to accept a lower price than he would otherwise get. We are now adding 75,000 tons to that lower price category. L.B.P[earson]

On commercial grounds Norway is a historical customer for Canadian wheat and flour, deserving our best consideration.

The difficulty, you know, is that by the time the Canadian Quantity is increased to 235,000,000 bushels, we have reached the maximum prudent commitment in respect of our average production. This maximum figure will allow an increase in the Canadian guaranteed quantity of only 5.4 million bushels in 1951-52, and 3.4 million bushels in 1952-53.

Mr. McNamara reported from Washington this week that the United States State Department has been promoting the accession of Japan to the Agreement and has received the concurrence of the U.K. Government in the unconditional accession of Japan to the Agreement at the meeting of the Council in June. Japan's accession will take up almost all the whole of Canada's additional quantity in 1951-52 and will exceed what Canada is putting in for 1952-53. Although our additional quantities are not necessarily earmarked by countries of destination, this means in effect that our increased quantities cannot go to help Belgium unless the United States is prepared to put in more than its share of the Japanese quantity and there is still the problem of doing something for Norway.

In any event it is difficult for Canada to give the impression that we are putting in additional quantities for particular countries. Following is a list of the increases requested by importing countries. Although we may be sympathetic to the requests of Belgium and Norway and not much interested in the other requests, it would be a mistake to give the impression that we are prepared to do something for Belgium and Norway and not for the other countries.

	Metric Tons	Bushels
1. Egypt	200,000	7,348,742
2. Denmark	56,000	2,057,648
3. Belgium	250,000	9,165,927
4. Israel	120,000	4,409,245
5. Ecuador	4,000	146,975
6. Mexico	150,000	5,511,556
7. Spain	100,000	3,674,371
8. El Salvador	2,000	73,487
9. Bolivia	25,000	918,593
10. Indonesia	50,000	1,837,186
11. Norway	75,000	2,755,778
12. Dominican Republic	2,162	79,440
	1,034,162	37,998,948

After all these requests accumulated last winter when it became apparent that a strong wheat market had developed, when supplies from Russia and Argentina had dried up, and when it appeared that the importing countries could not "lose" under the terms of the Agreement in its remaining two years.

This raises the question whether the Government is being fair to the producers in agreeing to any increases at all in Canada's guaranteed quantity under present circumstances. The wheat involved in the additional quantities could otherwise be sold at Class II prices above the IWA ceiling.

If there is political urgency in meeting the Norwegian request, reply could take the form of indicating our preparedness to sell them the 75,000 tons at Class II prices if we have the wheat in addition to our IWA quantities. If, however, the real issue is that Norway wants the wheat on IWA price terms, then it should be a question of whether the Canadian Government or the Canadian and Norwegian Governments together should undertake to make up the difference between the IWA and Class II price.

RE NORWEGIAN REQUEST FOR INCREASED INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT QUANTITY

Thanks for your memorandum of May 5th regarding confidential Aide Mémoire submitted to the Department of External Affairs by the Norwegian Minister, on April 24th.

It seems to me that Norway deserves special consideration from Canada, having in mind that Norway has been a good customer for Canadian wheat in the past, and that the increased quantity is intended to replace present purchases by Norway from Russia.

I appreciate the difficulty of singling out any country for special consideration, but, on the other hand, I suggest that Mr. McIvor be advised of our special interest in Norway and asked to do what he can to have the extra quantity for Norway included in the International Wheat Agreement. If a pre-arrangement with Canada is necessary to accomplish this end (which I doubt), I see no harm in Mr. McIvor indicating that Canada will be glad to fill this allotment out of the additional quantity that we will accept.

I do not share your view that Canada should not increase its present allocation under the Agreement. I think that we should accept an additional quantity up to an overall ceiling of 235 million bushels. It is true that this may net slightly less for the Canadian producers, but it seems to me that we have an over-riding responsibility to make countries such as Norway believe that it is worth while to trade with America rather than with Russia.

I do not agree that Norway will be happy about an offer from Canada to supply this wheat as Class 2, provided we have a surplus over our Class I quantity. Norway knows now that we will do this in any event.

There is no doubt that External Affairs will press the Government to adopt the attitude I have outlined above, and I must say that I agree with External Affairs as to the desirability of this procedure.

Attention: Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre

Dear Mr. Plumptre:

Further to my letter of May 15,† this will let you know that Messrs. McIvor and McNamara of the Canadian Wheat Board have had discussions with Mr. Howe on the question of an increase in the guaranteed quantity under the International Wheat Agreement for Norway.

Their discussion is summarized in Mr. McNamara's notes which I quote:

"Mr. McNamara reviewed his recent Washington discussions and recommended to Mr. Howe that, if the Council approved the Japanese accession, Canada should agree to increase her guaranteed sales to 235 million but should not go over this figure. This would mean that Canada, in the event of the Japanese accession, would not be in a position to increase her quota to enable the Belgian and Norwegian quotas to be increased.

Mr. Howe agreed this appeared to be the best solution but pointed out he would have liked to be in a position to assist Norway.

Mr. McNamara suggested that no further action be taken with regard to Norway until after we were sure of the Japanese accession. At that time he and Mr. Riddell would approach Norway, and if necessary would go to Oslo, to try to work out a deal for Canada to supply Norway with a substantial quantity of wheat and flour within the present Norwegian IWA quota. Mr. Howe thought this would be a good idea."

You will recall that a year ago last March as a result of Secretary of Agriculture Brannan's visit to Ottawa, Mr. Howe and Mr. Brannan agreed on a basis of distribution between Canada and the United States of the Japanese quantity in the event of Japan's accession to the Agreement.[29] Recent information indicates that Japan again will apply for accession at the June meeting of the International Wheat Council. Mr. Howe feels that the undertaking given more than a year ago to support the Japanese accession must still be honoured. This accession will not be assured, however, until the June meeting of the Council. Mr. McNamara will be attending the Council meeting and if the Japanese accession takes up any Canadian balance to a limit of 235 million bushels, Mr. McNamara will explain the situation to the Norwegian representative at the Council and will also go to Oslo to discuss with the Norwegian authorities the possibility of a firm contract covering Norwegian requirements within the limits of IWA in an effort to have the Norwegians understand our position and be satisfied in respect of their own requirements.

Yours faithfully,

C.F. WILSON

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, May 31, 1951

My dear Colleague:

I understand that you have recently discussed with Mr. McIvor and Mr. McNamara of the Wheat Board the question of supplying Canadian wheat in order to accommodate Norway's request for an increase of 75,000 tons under the International Wheat Agreement, and that our ability to do so turns on the accession of Japan to the Agreement.

I know you are in complete accord with the desirability of providing for Norway's additional needs which are due largely to her unwillingness to exchange strategic commodities for Russian wheat, and I am wondering whether you might consider it worthwhile to re-open discussions with the United States Government before the next Council meeting to seek a means of providing, if possible, for both Japanese accession and Norway's increased quota. A member of the United States Embassy recently discussed with one of my officials the question of our commitment to supply wheat for the Japanese accession; the manner in which the question was raised leads us to believe that the United States Government may be doubtful whether, in view of the changed circumstances, our commitment in regard to the Japanese accession is still operative.

If the commitment is not operative, or if the negotiations with the United States could be re-opened, there will have to be a decision on whether we should give Japan or Norway priority. I should be grateful for your views on the relative impor-

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, June 1, 1951

My dear Colleague:

I have your letter of May 31st regarding the International Wheat Agreement and commitments under the Agreement by Canada on the accession of Japan.

Canada today is committed to furnish 229 million bushels of wheat under IWA. It is understood that our total commitment under IWA will not exceed 235 million bushels. Therefore, our total additional commitment is limited to six million bushels.

The United States have understood for some time that we will take up our additional commitment when Japan is admitted to IWA. This agreement was made by Mr. Gardiner and myself at our meeting with Secretary Brannan, held in Ottawa. I understand that the U.S. Department of Agriculture was very firm about holding us to this commitment.

We have made it clear to the Executive Committee of IWA that Canada would like to increase the allotment of Norway, and is willing to furnish IWA wheat for that purpose, subject to our total commitment of 235 million bushels. However, we have made it clear that we cannot do this if we must make our contribution to Japan.

Mr. McNamara, of the Canadian Wheat Board, is now in England to attend the Annual Meeting of IWA as the representative of Canada. He will do his best to have the allotment to Norway increased, but, if this fails, he intends to make a personal visit to Norway and to assure that country that Canada will take care of the full requirement, partly within and partly without IWA, assuming that our harvest enables us to fill our IWA commitment.

Our relations with Norway as to wheat have been very satisfactory in the past, and we are inclined to think that Norway will be satisfied with such assurances as Mr. McNamara can give. I regret that it seems improbable that Norway can be given the increased allotment under IWA for which her application is now being made.

Yours sincerely,

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT COUNCIL

Following for C.D. Howe from McNamara, Begins: Johannessen called to see me prior to the opening of the council to discuss the possibility of increasing Norway's quota by 75,000 tons for each of the remaining years of the agreement. He appeared to be under the impression, as a result of advice from the Norwegian Embassy in Ottawa, that Canada had agreed to support Norway's application, and would be prepared to put the necessary wheat into the agreement. I explained that with the probable accession of Japan, on which we had committed ourselves previously, the Canadian quota would reach its absolute ceiling, and that we could not contemplate any further increase at this time. I told him, however, that we were anxious to help Norway, and would be prepared to negotiate at once with Norway for any amount within its present quota which it wished to obtain from Canada in 1951/52. Moreover, that we would give Norway first option on the purchase of 75,000 tons outside the wheat agreement if, as seemed not likely, the Canadian crops were large enough to permit additional exports.

2. Johannessen had hoped that I could go further than this, and did not show great interest in the suggestion that Riddell and I should go to Oslo to discuss these propositions after the council meeting. He explained Norway's difficulties about the supply of wheat from the USSR, and in this connection mentioned our joint participation in the North Atlantic Pact. He added that Norway was not so much concerned about obtaining the extra wheat at agreement prices, as about arranging for guaranteed supplies to meet average import requirements. While Johannessen seemed a bit disappointed that it was not possible for us to raise our quota, I think he does understand that we had a prior commitment for Japan, and also appreciates how difficult it would be for us to give Norway special treatment other than that which I have offered, when so many other countries are seeking increased quotas.

3. Since there is always the possibility that you will be receiving further representations through the Norwegian Embassy in Ottawa I thought it would be useful to let you know what had happened at this end.

1. After further discussions with Johannessen who now completely understands and sympathises with Canadian inability to increase its guaranteed sales in order to meet Norwegian requirements, McNamara has agreed to conclude a firm contract with Norway for 40,000 long tons at 1951/52 agreement prices, plus carrying charge. In addition, Norway is being given an option on a further 40,000 tons on the same terms. The option will run until November 30th this year.[30]

[F.G.] Hooton We might send a letter to Steen embodying this information. W.P[lumptre]

You will observe that this telegram indicates that the United Kingdom have reached a firm decision to stay in the Canal Zone come what may. Their military advisers are completely confident that this can be done. The United Kingdom, however, foresee probable action by the Egyptian Government which will require counter-action involving the use of force on the British part to maintain their position in the Canal Zone. The United Kingdom express the hope that they will have the "full moral support" of the Canadian, Australian, New Zealand and South African Governments, as well as of the United States and other countries concerned in the area, in the stand they are taking.

The Embassy in Washington has been instructed to enquire what line the United States is taking. However, I am inclined to think that although it would be useful to know what the United States view is, we should not wait on them. It is suggested that we might comment orally on the telegram along the following lines:

(a) that the Canadian Government appreciates being kept informed of developments in the Middle East by the United Kingdom;

(b) that the Canadian Government agrees with the view that it is of major importance for the security of the free world that the United Kingdom should continue to fulfil its responsibilities for the defence of the Canal Zone pending satisfactory arrangements for the security of the area;

(c) that the Canadian Government is confident that the United Kingdom will do its utmost to avoid the use of force and to achieve a mutually satisfactory arrangement with Egypt;

(d) that it is proposed to inform the United States Government of the general moral support being given to the United Kingdom Government on this issue and to impress on the United States Government the necessity of early solution of the problem.

EGYPT

Please communicate following message to Canadian, Australian, New Zealand and South African Governments. Begins.

1. We have had under urgent review situation created by Egyptian Government's move to abrogate the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of 1936 and the Condominium Agreements of 1899 regarding the Sudan.

2. Canadian/Australian/New Zealand/South African Governments are already fully informed on the proposals which have been presented to the Egyptian Government in regard to the latter's participation in the defence of the Middle East. We are satisfied that these proposals would enable the foundations of the defence of the whole of the Middle East region to be broadened and strengthened and that they provide a sound and reasonable basis for a settlement of Anglo-Egyptian differences in regard to the Treaty of 1936. We are prepared to discuss them patiently with Egypt. But we must make it clear that we have reached in these proposals, the limit of concessions we could make regarding the position of British troops and the base. The Canadian/Australian/New Zealand/South African Governments also know of the proposals which have been put forward by us to Egypt for a settlement in regard to the Sudan. In our view these latter proposals fully meet the legitimate interests of Egypt. It would be out of the question for us to depart from our undertakings to the peoples of the Sudan which we have recently publicly re-affirmed.

3. On the 9th October, the United Kingdom Government announced that they maintained their full rights under the Treaty and the Condominium Agreements pending a satisfactory agreement with Egypt. It was implicit in that statement that until such an agreement were reached our troops would stay in the Canal Zone. This is indeed our intention. It would probably be too much to hope for an early conclusion of a settlement with Egypt. A radical change in their present attitude is necessary and may take time. It follows that we shall have to stand our ground firmly in the Canal Zone — using force if necessary — until an acceptable agreement has been reached.

4. We have considered the implications of this decision. Our Commanders-in-Chief in the Middle East have the necessary plans ready. These foresee action by the Egyptian Government together with the appropriate British counter-measures under various stages.

5. Stage I can be said to have begun with Nahas Pasha's action on the 8th October. At this stage the Commanders-in-Chief contemplate and have been authorised to institute at their discretion, what may be called passive security measures. These involve a formal request to Egyptian local authorities to maintain order, the stopping of leave to Cairo and Alexandria (which has already been enforced), the posting of additional security guards and the like.

6. Stage II arises if the Egyptian Government resorts to administrative non-cooperation. At this stage the Government might obstruct and delay customs, posts, civil aviation, quarantine clearances and the clearance of ships through the Suez Canal and interfere with our labour supply. There might be increased rudeness, official and individual, to the British personnel. Hostile demonstrations and minor violence might take place. In such a situation our passive security measures would be continued but intensified. Military protective patrols might have to be instituted and families of all ranks in the Canal Zone concentrated into more secure areas. Here again the Commanders-in-Chief have been given authority to take the appropriate counter-measures.

7. Stage III would amount to an Egyptian blockade of our forces. The Egyptian Government would no doubt pretend that our position in Egypt was illegal and would attempt to persuade us, by such measures as the withdrawal of labour supplies and port facilities and restriction of movement in and out of the Canal Zone, to withdraw. They might refuse the passage of ships through the Canal. We naturally hope that this stage will be averted but if it is forced upon us we should have to take counter-blockade measures. The nature of these would naturally depend on the particular steps which the Egyptian Government took on their side. It would almost certainly be necessary to re-enforce our troops in the Canal Zone and might eventually be necessary to take complete control there. In the worst case Egyptian troops might have to be removed by force if necessary. We might also have to take certain additional measures to ensure the passage of shipping through the Canal.

8. We trust that we shall not be faced with stage III. If it should, however, be forced on us we shall face it and see it through. Our military advisers are completely confident of our ability to hold and maintain ourselves in the Canal Zone. Much as we should regret the necessity of using force we would not shrink from our responsibilities if the situation demanded it. We are confident that in this course we should have the full moral support of Canadian, Australian, New Zealand and South Africa as well as of the United States and the other countries to whom, as well as to us, the freedom of the Middle East region is of vital interest. The consequences of a withdrawal, which to us is unthinkable whether from the military, political or moral point of view, would be so disastrous, not merely for this country, but for the Commonwealth and for the Western Allies as a whole, that it is essential that we should stand firm together.

9. None of the counter-measures envisaged under Stage III has yet been authorised. It may be some time before the need for this arises. On the other hand it might arise at any moment and without warning. In giving such authority the United Kingdom Government would naturally do their utmost to consult the other Governments principally concerned in organising Middle East defence.

10. Should matters come to this pass there would of course be no hope of organising the Middle East Command on the lines contemplated and in our view we should be obliged to proceed without Egypt. Indeed that hope would be shattered much sooner if the Egyptian Government definitely reject the agreed proposals. But in either case it would seem all the more urgent to press on with the Command arrangements and we would be strongly in favour of agreeing as soon as possible at least upon the appointment of a Supreme Allied Commander and we would place British forces in the Canal Zone under his command as contemplated in our proposals. In view of Egypt's non-co-operation the Allied headquarters would no doubt have to be set up outside Egypt. The United Kingdom Government for their part would agree to the establishment of the headquarters in Cyprus.

11. We would reject any suggestion that as the existence of a base in Egypt is a cardinal feature of the Allied Middle East Command organisation there can be no Allied base there if Egypt will not participate. The United Kingdom intend to hold the Egyptian base. If the Egyptians agree to participate in the Middle East Command, well and good, and the base would become an Allied base. But if there is no agreement with Egypt we still intend to hold the base so that it may be available for use by the Allies. And it is in this sense that we shall regard ourselves as agents acting on behalf of the free world when we say that we intend to stay in Egypt at whatever cost and ask for the support and encouragement of the Canadian, Australian, New Zealand, Union Government in our stand.

12. We are explaining matters equally fully to the United States Government and have asked for their support also. We shall also be in communication with the French and Turkish Governments. The support of the Indian and Pakistan Governments (and of the Government of Ceylon) would be of immense value and our High Commissioners at Delhi, Karachi and Colombo have had instructions to give these Governments full information about the Command and Sudan proposals and our policy generally (without however revealing anything about our military plans — such as paragraphs 5, 6, 7, 9 and 10 above).

13. Copies are being given to Canadian, Australian, New Zealand and South African High Commissioners in London.

RE ANGLO-EGYPTIAN CRISIS

Attached is a draft statement for your consideration and discussion in Cabinet this morning. It has been prepared on the assumption that the Government will be prepared to accede to the U.K. Government's request for "moral support" of their position with respect to the canal zone, as set out in the message communicated to us by Clutterbuck. (An additional copy of this message is attached).

2. There are three inter-related questions to be decided by Cabinet:

(a) should we accede to the U.K. Government's request for moral support?

(b) if the answer to (a) is yes, should we inform the U.S. Government and urge them to do likewise? and,

(c) should a statement of the Government's position be made in Parliament?

3. The Canadian Government have traditionally been reluctant to express opinions with respect to Middle Eastern questions on the ground that our commitments elsewhere wholly involve our limited resources. Nevertheless, the present situation is so critical in affecting the general peace that the argument in favour of our doing anything we can to help stabilize the position is very strong indeed. Wrong tells me that it is possible that prompt Canadian support for the British decision to stand firm may have some real influence upon the U.S. decision, and the decision which the United States is to take is all important. (France has already expressed publicly its support of the British stand).

4. Moral support is of little value unless it is made public and it would be preferable for us to make our own attitude known rather than have the United Kingdom announce that they were being "backed by the whole Commonwealth". Further, publicity to be effective should be prompt.

5. Yesterday, in answer to Mr. Green's question you said that "if anything can usefully be said, I shall say it at the first opportunity". There is therefore an opening for you to make a statement today when the House assembles at 1.30. For the reasons set out above I believe that something along the lines of the attached draft should be said then and that I should be instructed to have Wrong inform the U.S. Government immediately of our intentions.[31]

Projet de déclaration sur l'Égypte

Draft Statement on Egypt

The Canadian Government has been kept informed by the United Kingdom Government of developments in the present critical relations with Egypt.

2. The Canadian Government regrets exceedingly the action taken by the Egyptian Government to repudiate the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of 1936. It is the more regrettable in view of the fact that alternative arrangements were under discussion with the Egyptian Government. It is of the utmost importance for the maintenance of mutual confidence in international relations that when a nation enters an international agreement it should fulfil its obligations thereunder.

3. The situation which has developed is highly inflammable. The Canadian Government, however, is confident that both parties will do their utmost to avoid any breach of the peace and to achieve a satisfactory arrangement for the security of the area.

4. The Canadian Government considers that it is of major importance for the security of the free world that, pending satisfactory arrangements for the security of the area, the United Kingdom should continue to fulfil its responsibilities for the defence of the Canal Zone.[32]

EGYPTIAN SITUATION; SUPPORT FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM

14. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the U.K. government were very worried at the possibility that the dangerous situation in Egypt might worsen and spread in the Middle East. The U.K. commander had been ordered to defend the area in which British troops were stationed under the 1936 Agreement and also to expel Egyptians from the area. A brigade was being moved from Cyprus and another might be moved if required. The United Kingdom was anxious to improve the situation and felt that improvement might result if it received strong support from the United States. If such support was not forthcoming, the Egyptian government might take further provocative action. The U.K. government had asked that Canada, among other countries, provide moral support through a public statement that the position in the canal zone ought not to be altered by force. They wished also to have views, in support of the position taken by the United Kingdom, communicated to the U.S. government in order to encourage a strong backing in Washington and, if possible, a public statement there of support.

15. Mr. Pearson read a draft statement.

16. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, agreed that:

(a) the Secretary of State for External Affairs inform the United States government that the Canadian government considered that support ought to be given to the U.K. government in the difficulties that had arisen in Egypt; and,

(b) the draft public statement be revised in accordance with the discussion and submitted for further consideration at the next meeting.

2. The Canadian Government regrets exceedingly the action taken unilaterally by the Egyptian Government to denounce the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of 1936; action all the more regrettable in view of the fact that alternative arrangements were under discussion with the Egyptian Government at the time the denunciation took place.

3. The situation which has developed is highly inflammable. The Canadian Government, however, is confident that both parties will do their utmost to avoid any breach of the peace and to achieve a satisfactory arrangement for the security of the area.

4. The Canadian Government considers that it is of major importance for the security of the free world and, indeed, for peace, that pending the conclusion of new arrangements for the Suez Canal zone, which should be satisfactory to the two governments most concerned, no attempt should be made to alter, by force, the position as now established by international agreement in that zone.

ANGLO-EGYPTIAN CRISIS

We have had another look at your draft revision of the proposed statement.

Frankly, we do not like the proposed new paragraph 4 since it almost puts Egypt and the United Kingdom on the same footing. It would not be regarded as an expression of "moral support" for the British decision to "stand firm".

If the Cabinet are not prepared to mention the United Kingdom, perhaps the following paragraph 4 would do:

"The Canadian Government considers it of major importance for the security of the free world and, indeed, for the maintenance of peace, that, pending the conclusion of satisfactory alternative arrangements, no action should be taken to alter by force the present regime of responsibility for the defence of the Suez Canal zone."[34]

You may have noticed that the United States Secretary of State is reported to have said today that the British Government is entirely within its rights in maintaining its position. The French have said they "will back up the British Government to the full in resisting unjustified Egyptian pressure".

Would it be possible to add to the above-quoted paragraph some such words as:

[34] Pearson a ajouté les mots « by force » à la dernière phrase de ce paragraphe.
Pearson added the words "by force" to the final sentence of this paragraph.

Meanwhile, in the opinion of the Canadian Government the United Kingdom is justified in maintaining firmly its position in that zone against unjustified pressure.[35]

EGYPT; SUPPORT OF U.K. POSITION

17. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of October 17th, 1951, reported that, since the meeting, the U.S. government had sent notes to the United Kingdom and Egyptian governments strongly supporting the British position. The French government had also given a public indication of support. In accordance with the decision of the Cabinet, a message as to the views of the Canadian government had been sent to the U.S. Secretary of State in advance of his statement. It might now be desirable to make the government's position public. A draft statement was read.

18. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs be authorized to make a statement on the position of the government in relation to the Egyptian crisis in accordance with the draft submitted, but subject to the deletion of the final paragraph; the explanation to be given in the course of the general statement of policy on October 22nd, unless a specific question made an earlier announcement desirable.

THE MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON EGYPT

Mr. Chadwick of Earnscliffe came to see me this morning by arrangement to raise a point on the Minister's statement on the Anglo-Egyptian treaties made in

---

[35] Pearson a approuvé cette phrase à la condition qu'elle soit modifiée. La phrase originale se lisait comme suit :
Pearson approved this sentence with amendments. The sentence originally read:
"In the opinion of the Canadian Government the United Kingdom is justified in maintaining its position."

the House on October 17. He mentioned casually that Clutterbuck and Thomson were away. Earnscliffe had received a short informal letter from Liesching enquiring why the Minister had added his reference to the United States, which read as follows:

> "The Secretary of State of the United States has already characterized this repudiation and, indeed, also that of the agreements of 1899, regarding the Sudan, as without validity. We agree with that view."

2. Clutterbuck had seen Mr. Pearson late the previous afternoon and Mr. Pearson had given to him a draft of the statement he was then proposing to make, which contained no reference to the attitude of the United States. Clutterbuck had sent a telegram that evening reporting on his conversation.

3. I said that I didn't really know why the paragraph had been added and that possibly it was because Acheson's public statement had not been available sooner. From his file of telegrams Chadwick thought that this might be the case but I subsequently found that it was not the explanation. I went on to give him some personal observations. I said that it was surely not surprising that in Ottawa we would be interested in the public position of the United States. As a matter now almost of instinct and habit, we were accustomed to consult both London and Washington on all major questions. Furthermore, Canada had not taken any particular interest in the Middle East and it considered it an area beyond our immediate concern. Thus, as the C.R.O. knew, we had only sent an observer to the meeting of Commonwealth Defence Ministers on Middle East defence policy last June.[36] We had not been invited to become members in the proposed Middle East Command. When the proposals were in some draft stage in the planning machinery of NATO, we had said that we were not directly concerned. It was not surprising that we had not been invited to participate in this defence organization.

4. I said that we had a very limited knowledge in the Department about the Middle East and didn't even have a mission in Cairo. It was, therefore, of some value to us to learn that another "neutral" state, in the sense of not being a party to the treaties in question, should have concluded that the Egyptian action was without validity.

5. I remarked that no one in our Parliament would be likely to comment adversely on the inclusion of this paragraph in the Minister's statement. We had in Ottawa in all important matters to take into consideration the United States position. On the other hand, if it had not been included, there might well have been criticism from Quebec Members.

6. I subsequently had a word with the Minister on this. He said that he felt that he had not misled Clutterbuck in any way. He had told Clutterbuck the line he would take in his public statement but that this did not bind him to any advance text, and the statement he delivered did not differ in any material sense from the rough memorandum he had handed Clutterbuck. The Minister also said that the statement had been added to forestall any possible criticism from Quebec quarters. He reminded me of the celebrated Chanaq incident of 1922. I subsequently told Chadwick that the paragraph had been included to make the statement as widely acceptable in all political quarters in Canada as possible. He wanted his enquiry to be treated as quite informal and he didn't want too much importance to be attached to it.

7. I understand that the above does not cover the whole story and that, in fact, our Cabinet had insisted on knowing the United States position before it was prepared to agree to a statement giving any measure of support to the United Kingdom. I did not, of course, tell Chadwick this. Otherwise, it would simply have confirmed what I think is Liesching's suspicion that the final paragraph of the Minister's statement should be regarded as a conditional on the American attitude indicated two paragraphs above.

8. I asked Chadwick whether South Africa had yet made any public statement indicating its support of the United Kingdom, remarking that South Africa was vitally concerned in the Suez Canal, at least as much as Australia and New Zealand. He said that the South Africans did not intend to make any public statement. He read me a telegram in which the South Africans said that, not being parties to the treaties in question, they were not directly concerned, but went on to stress the great importance they attached to the maintenance of the existing defence facilities in the Canal zone. I learned subsequently from Mr. Campbell that we had received a letter from the South African High Commissioner here to this same effect.

ARMS FOR ISRAEL

In February the Canadian Commercial Corporation requested permission to quote to a private firm representing the Government of Israel on the supply of fifty 25 pounder guns together with 50,000 rounds of ammunition. It was determined that neither the guns nor the ammunition could be supplied by the Department of National Defence, Canadian Arsenals Limited or Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. The Canadian Commercial Corporation advised the firm that a quotation could not be given.

2. The Consul General of Israel in Montreal wrote to us on April 4th requesting a quotation on twenty five guns of the same calibre with 25,000 rounds of ammunition and accessories. This new request was based on the Consul General's belief that during the past few months changes had taken place in Canada's armaments supply position which would now permit a quotation to be made. The question of availability was explored and we are informed by the Department of National Defence that the army is not prepared, at the present time, to reduce its stocks of these guns, ammunition and accessories, and by the Department of Defence Production that the material requested is not available from current production and it is not anticipated that it will be in the foreseeable future.

3. The Joint Intelligence Bureau of the Department of National Defence had no objection to a quotation, but this was before the recent flare-up on the Israeli-Syrian border. It has been our practice to consult Washington and London before approving exports of arms to the Middle East. We have not done so in this case because of doubts regarding availability, which we thought should be clarified first.

4. We do not usually give our reasons for refusing an export permit application or permission for a quotation, and, unless you otherwise instruct us, we propose to let the Consul General of Israel know that we are unable to submit a quotation at the present time, nor is it expected that we will be in a position to do so in the foreseeable future.[37]

Dave Croll came in to see me today about some bomb orders for Israel.[38] I said that in regard to the proposed order for 20,000 bombs, there did not seem to me to be any political objection, as these are anti-tank weapons and, therefore, defensive in character.

He also asked whether it would be possible to get 25 25-pounders. Here again I said that as the number was small, I could see no political objection.

I made it clear, however, that in both the above cases there might be supply considerations which would make it impossible to meet the Israeli request. That was a matter they would have to take up with the appropriate Department.

I think that on general grounds we should not be reluctant now to supply reasonable quantities of arms to Israel on the usual condition that they would be used only for defence. The Israeli Government is working more closely with the U.K., their relations are better, while, on the other hand, the relations with Egypt are deterio-

VI. SALE OF GUNS TO ISRAEL

40. The Minister of National Defence said that there had been an enquiry as to whether the government would sell Israel 25-pounder guns from stocks. Twenty-five were desired in the first instance.

The Army had a considerable stock which, as the Standing Group had been told some time ago, it was intended to transfer to European NATO countries as U.S.-type replacements became available. Neither the Standing Group nor the NATO countries had taken any action to suggest allocation of the first 144 guns that would be available for release on September 1st, 1951, and his department considered that at least 56 of this number were available for transfer to Israel if that was considered desirable as a matter of policy.

The government had refrained from making offensive weapons available to areas of actual or potential conflict and, as a state of war existed between Israel and Egypt — at least in the latter's view — Israel and the neighbouring Arab states had been regarded as falling within this category.

He and the Secretary of State for External Affairs felt that a relaxation of this policy with respect to Israel was now perhaps warranted. With the Arab world in a state of internal unrest and mounting anti-Western hysteria, Israel was emerging as the one stable element in the area. The United Kingdom had been exploring the possibility of mutual security arrangements with Israel of the type it has with certain Arab states and which the latter might abrogate. Possibly Israel would assume the role in Western defence of the southern pivot in plans for the defence of the Mediterranean and Middle East regions. Further, as the Middle East might have to unite for defence and arms furnished to Arabs or Jews would strengthen the area as a whole, it was perhaps reasonable to take the risk of arms being used by states in the area against each other. It would be unwise to discriminate between Israel and the Arab states in the supply of arms.

There were, thus, no objections, on grounds of availability or advisability, to selling twenty-five 25-pounders from stocks to Israel.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Memorandum, Ministers of National Defence and External Affairs, August 29th, 1951, "Sale of guns to Israel" — Cabinet Document D-298)†

41. Mr. Claxton thought that it might be desirable to explore the proposal informally with the U.K. and U.S. authorities before the guns were promised to Israel.

42. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the United Kingdom and the United States frequently took similar action without consulting Canada, and thought it sufficient to notify them that it had been decided to sell the guns to Israel in case they had any observations to make.

The small number of guns involved would not constitute any significant threat to the Arab states, and Israel could, of course, be asked to give an assurance that they would not be used for purposes of aggression. In any case, Egypt was the country chiefly responsible for the continued unrest in the area. The United Kingdom had for some time been well satisfied with its relations with Israel.

43. The Prime Minister said that possession by Israel of additional arms should have a stabilizing effect in the area. He doubted that it had any aggressive intentions.

44. The Minister of Defence Production said that he thought it would be reasonable to sell the guns at replacement cost.

45. The Committee, after further discussion, noted the report of the Ministers of National Defence and External Affairs and agreed that:

(a) the U.K. and U.S. authorities be notified in confidence that it was planned to sell twenty-five 25-pounder guns to Israel from stocks; and

(b) unless the U.K. or U.S. authorities then offered unfavourable comments, those concerned be advised that the government was prepared to sell these guns at replacement cost.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL

The Canadian Commercial Corporation has referred to us the request of Sumac Industries Limited, agents of the Government of Israel, to purchase 20,000 bombs, PIAT, H.E. RDX/TN T 50/50 Mark 4 L/N, valued at $129,540.00. Permission to give a quotation on these bombs was granted on August 7th.

2. The Joint Intelligence Bureau of the Department of National Defence has been consulted. The Army is unable to say to what extent this order might reflect a stockpiling programme and does not know what stocks of bombs of this nature are [39] Une note écrite à la main a été jointe à cette note :/A hand-written note was attached to this memorandum:

Sept 11/51 Mr Reid:
The previous memo [not located], which you sent back to us, deliberately refrained from a recommendation. The difficulty is that most officials doubt the desirability of this export. On the other hand the Minister has indicated in a similar case that he approves, and this policy was recently approved by Cabinet Defence Committee (see para[graph] 5 of attached memo).
Some weeks ago, when this same consignment was being considered, not for export but for quotations, a memo went to the Minister without a recommendation. However, it may be a bad precedent to follow. I attach a new memo. A.F.W.P[lumptre].

[40] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Mr. Reid, As the memo now reads, it looks rather as if a change of policy is involved. Cabinet has only delegated authority to our Minister in cases "which raise no new questions of policy or important political considerations." In view of the decision of Cabinet Defence Committee, this memo to the Minister is probably O.K. but I thought I'd better call this point to your attention. A.F.W.P[lumptre]. Sept 12/51.

already held by the Israelis or from what other sources they may be receiving some. Furthermore, in the view of the Army, the number of these bombs asked for appears to exceed normal training requirements and the order, in fact, can hardly be considered essential to "the maintenance of internal security". For these reasons the Army cannot give its concurrence to the export.

3. Somewhat similar comments were made by the Army when the views of the Joint Intelligence Bureau were asked with respect to the submission of a quotation, although the Army then said that it had no objection to a quotation being given.

4. Israel is still in a state of war with several of her Arab neighbours and can be considered as an area of possible conflict. Our practice, as you know, has been to refrain from making offensive weapons available to areas of conflict or possible conflict.

5. However, in the recent joint recommendation you submitted with Mr. Claxton to the Cabinet Defence Committee with respect to the sale to Israel of twenty-five 25 pounder guns, it was stated that relaxation of the practice of refraining from making offensive weapons available to areas of conflict or possible conflict might be warranted in the case of Israel which is not only beginning to emerge as the only stable element in the whole Middle East area, but which may also assume an important role in Western defence plans for the Mediterranean and Middle East areas. On the other hand, it is clear from the Standing Group's recommendation that the proposed Middle East command headquarters be set up in Egyptian territory that the Western powers are not yet prepared to abandon traditional defence links with Egypt and the Arab states and replace them with similar arrangements with Israel. It would therefore seem unwise to relax our practice with regard to the export of arms to Israel without according a similar privilege to the Arab states with respect to any arms orders they may endeavour to place in Canada, and it is for this reason that the joint memorandum to the Cabinet Defence Committee emphasized that there should be no discrimination as between Israel and the Arab states in the matter of the supply of arms. As that memorandum pointed out, there is, of course, the additional consideration that the whole Middle East area may someday have to unite to defend itself against a common enemy. All military equipment made available either to Arabs or Jews now will therefore tend to strengthen the area as a whole against outside aggression.

6. On political grounds, therefore, there would appear to be grounds for adopting a less rigid policy towards both Arabs and Jews regarding the supply of arms than has hitherto been observed by the Canadian Government.

7. Having regard to the political considerations outlined above and considering that the Army's inability to approve the application under reference is mainly based on the excessive quantity involved, you may wish to approve the export of a smaller quantity — perhaps 10,000 bombs instead of the 20,000 requested. If so, I will inform the Canadian Commercial Corporation that this Department has no objection to the sale and export of 10,000 of these PIAT bombs to the Government of Israel.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL

1. With respect to the proposed sale of twenty-five 25-pounder guns to Israel, the Cabinet Defence Committee at its meeting of August 30 agreed that:

"(a) The United Kingdom and United States authorities be notified in confidence that it was planned to sell twenty-five 25-pounders to Israel from stocks; and

(b) Unless the United Kingdom or United States authorities then offer unfavourable comments, those concerned be advised that the Government was prepared to sell these guns at replacement cost."

2. Action was taken under (a) and the United Kingdom and United States authorities have offered the following comments:

(a) The Foreign Office had no comment to make except that Israel had already attempted to obtain guns of this calibre from the United Kingdom, but that the United Kingdom had not been able to supply them.

(b) An official of the State Department observed that the United States military authorities believed Israel's military equipment position was now somewhat in excess of that necessary to meet its needs for internal security and defence against localized aggression, and that for this reason the United States Government still was holding up a number of export applications from Israel for military equipment. This official also gave us his personal opinion that an export application from Israel for 25-pounder guns would not be approved by the United States Government.

3. The United Kingdom comments would appear to imply that if the guns had been available the United Kingdom might have supplied them to Israel.

4. We do not believe that the comments offered by the United States should be considered as "unfavourable" within the meaning of the Cabinet Defence Committee decision. There has been at least one instance when we were told that the United States would not approve an export permit application similar to one we had under consideration, and we learned later that they had issued an export permit for an identical order placed in that country after export approval from Canada had been denied. Recently we informed the State Department that we were holding up applications from India and Pakistan and we were advised that the United States were taking similar action. We have since seen photostat of a United States export permit for one of these applications. In this case there are attenuating circumstances, but no effort was made by the State Department to revoke or suspend the permit.

5. In the light of the above and of the particulars contained in the memorandum you jointly submitted with Mr. Claxton to the Cabinet Defence Committee, I would recommend that we proceed with the sale of these guns to Israel.[41]

6. If you agree, I propose that we inform the Canadian Commercial Corporation that it is authorized to negotiate the sale of twenty-five 25-pounder guns to Israel, at replacement cost.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL — PIATS

Colonel Croll called on Plumptre on September 25 to ask why, when Israel had asked for 20,000 Piats, this had been cut down to 10,000.

2. Plumptre said that the decision had been taken at the ministerial level and he was not really in a position to discuss it. He did, however, go so far as to say that conflicting advice had been received on the matter in the light of which it apparently seemed expedient to reduce the amount. He implied that you had gone as far as you felt you could under the circumstances in getting a decision favourable to Israel on this matter.

3. Plumptre said that he did not feel that he was in a position to give any further information which would have to come from yourself. Colonel Croll said he would be in touch with you very soon.

4. I attach for your convenience a copy of the memorandum which you approved and which reduced the amount of Piats from 20,000 to 10,000.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL

15. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that following a decision of the Cabinet Defence Committee on August 30th and after consulting U.K. and U.S. authorities, 25 Canadian 25-pounders had been sold to Israel from existing stocks. The government of Israel had now requested permission to purchase 11 additional 25-pounders, ancillary equipment for 36 25-pounder guns and 2,000 rounds of ammunition for each of these guns. The Department of National Defence was prepared to release from stocks the 11 guns requested and the ancillary equipment for the full 36 guns. There were insufficient stocks, however, to meet the ammunition requirements and it was suggested that a total of 17,250 pounds only be made available to Israel at this time. This was considered to be adequate for present Israeli needs.

It was thought that it would be politically advisable to meet the request of the government of Israel in this matter in view of the growing instability in the Arab world.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Secretary of State for External Affairs, Oct. 22, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 277-51)†

16. The Prime Minister felt that, in the circumstances, it would be desirable to approve the sale of the guns, equipment and ammunition to the government of Israel but that decision might be deferred on what action should be taken if, at a later date, the Israeli government placed an order with Canada for the manufacture of additional quantities of 25-pounder ammunition.

17. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the sale from Army stocks at replacement cost to the government of Israel of 11 25-pounder guns, ancillary equipment for 36 25-pounder guns and 17,250 rounds of 25-pounder ammunition as recommended and deferred decision on the attitude to be taken if, at a later date, the Israeli government requested the manufacture in Canada of additional quantities of ammunition.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État suppléant aux Affaires extérieures pour le premier ministre

Memorandum from Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

SECRET [Ottawa], November 26, 1951

The Canadian Commercial Corporation has referred to us the request of the Government of Israel for permission to receive a quotation on the supply of 1500 short tons of TNT. It is most likely that if permission is granted for a quotation, it will be followed by a firm order which, we are given to understand, might be the forerunner of orders for about 3,000 short tons annually over the next few years. This particular quotation provides for delivery for 500 short tons each during the months of February, April and June, 1952.

The Department of Defence Production is considering the rehabilitation of certain explosives plants which have been allowed to lapse since 1945. Interim orders of this nature would greatly facilitate the reaching of a decision in the matter, as they would provide work during the initial period of expansion.

The Joint Intelligence Bureau of the Department of National Defence has been consulted and has no objection to a quotation being given to the Government of Israel on this material and has indicated that it would likely approve an actual export.

Israel is still technically an area of conflict since a legal state of war exists with four of the Arab States. Recently, however, on the occasion of requests from Israel for the supply of twenty-five and then eleven 25-pounder guns with ancillary equipment and ammunition, we recommended to Cabinet a relaxation of the existing policy of refraining from sending to areas of conflict or possible conflict equipment or materials capable of being put to war purposes. Presumably this request could receive the same favourable consideration with even more reason, since TNT has a variety of commercial uses, and there is no evidence that it will be used for war purposes. Even admitting that part of the 1500 tons might be so used, the political considerations which prompted Cabinet to make an exception in the case of the 25-pounders, viz, the desirability of reinforcing the only stable country in the Middle East area, would apply equally to this present application.

Subject to your agreement, I would propose that we inform the Canadian Commercial Corporation that it may quote to the Government of Israel on the supply of these 1500 tons of TNT, with the understanding, however, that, should a firm order be received, we will be consulted once again.[42]

DESPATCH Copenhagen, March 29, 1951

FINAL IMPRESSIONS OF MOSCOW

1. On leaving Moscow after approximately two and a half years in the Soviet Union, it might be useful to record a few final impressions. What truth there is in the observation that to write about any country one should have been there either ten days or ten years, however, is peculiarly applicable to a country so vast and varied, so full of inconsistencies and contradictions, as the Soviet Union. A two-year term spent mainly in the isolated society of the Moscow diplomatic corps is barely enough to scratch the surface. The impressions so acquired are inevitably superficial and often, no doubt, misleading. The Kremlin divulges none of its secrets to the diplomatic corps. Attempts to divine them are less confident in Moscow than in the Western press. A few of the foreign specialists on Soviet affairs in Moscow develop a kind of sixth sense which enables them to extract a good deal from the atmosphere but experience has taught them to be undogmatic in their interpretations and cautious in their predictions. One of their most useful functions is to discourage facile speculation. In this despatch I shall merely note some of the changes I have observed since arriving in the Soviet Union in September, 1948, and record a few more general impressions derived mainly from conversations with Soviet citizens in several widely separated regions of the country.

2. All the more experienced foreign observers in Moscow warned me on my arrival of the futility of comparing conditions in the Soviet Union with conditions in the West. The only valid standard of comparison was with conditions as they had been in Russia itself before and after the Revolution, and during the last World War. Russian soldiers who had served in Germany and other central European countries had been able to compare their own living conditions with those abroad and had been so critical on their return that it had been necessary to put on a propaganda campaign to "correct" the opinions they were disseminating, but the great masses of the people knew almost nothing of life in the West and their only standard of comparison was with what they had experienced in their own country. Hence the actual level on which they were living was much less important than the direction of the curve.

3. During the war the Soviet standard of living had declined sharply from the level it had reached in the Thirties. This was to be expected and was accepted as part of the cost of the war. The changeover from war-time to peace-time production, however, seems to have been more complicated and to have proceeded more slowly than had been anticipated, with the result that in 1947 there was a serious production crisis with widespread discontent. By the middle of 1948 this critical point had been passed and the trend was again upwards. This upward trend has gradually gained momentum and the increase in the amount and variety of consumer goods available in the shops during the last eighteen months has been almost incredible. To the foreign observer it has been most noticeable in the appearance of the people. Two years ago they were all so badly dressed that foreigners were conspicuous wherever they went, merely by their clothes. Now they attract no particular attention even at the theatres, and the task of the militia men guarding foreign embassies has become increasingly difficult: they can no longer distinguish their own citizens by their clothes and are frequently embarrassed to find that they have asked non-Russians about to enter a foreign embassy if they are not perhaps "making a mistake". The rapid increase in production is also apparent in the large number of new shops of all kinds and new restaurants that have opened, in the fleets of new taxis and cars, etc. When it is remembered that heavy industry is always given priority, this increase is still more impressive. It has been easily the most striking phenomenon of the last two years in the Soviet Union.

4. Food rationing had been dropped some time before I arrived, but there were still long queues for all sorts of supplies. Now there only are seasonal shortages — the new lemon crop had just come in when I left, but the hens were staging their annual spring strike — but flour is the only important item of food that is restricted. It is sold only twice a year before festivals which call for a high consumption of griddle-cakes. Nobody supposes that flour is scarce, and the only probable explanation is that the State does not want people to bake their own bread or eat too many blinis. Together with the increase in the supply of consumer goods, there have been three substantial price reductions in the last two years. Food, clothing, shoes, and all sorts of everyday commodities are still fantastically high if the price is translated into dollars at the official rate of the rouble. Many of the prices seem high also in terms of Soviet wage averages as we know them, but it has been very obvious recently that the great majority of the people have money to spend and are spending it. In the lower income groups the explanation seems to be that rents are almost negligible, that all the adult members of the family are gainfully employed, and that there are various supplements to the basic pay, of which we know very little. I was surprised to discover, for instance, that a schoolteacher is paid extra for every paper she marks, that a hotel maid gets a month's holiday at Sochi on the Black Sea with all expenses paid, etc. People in the higher income brackets are buying jewellery and other luxury items, possibly as an investment. There are many big signs admonishing citizens to save their money and put it in the bank, but it is likely that most of the people who got one rouble for ten when the currency was changed in 1947 prefer to spend it.

5. The appearance of the city of Moscow itself has also improved greatly in the last two years. The street on which our Embassy stands, for instance, has changed almost beyond recognition. The cobblestones have been replaced by asphalt and all the old, tumbledown houses on both sides of the street have been remonted so that they look almost like new buildings. The same is true of many other streets in different parts of the city. There are still many very shabby sections, of course, but no doubt they will all be tackled in turn according to plan. In spite of a great deal of new building, some of it apparently very good and some incredibly bad, the housing situation in Moscow is still unsatisfactory even by Russian standards. The Government is now taking steps to reduce the metropolitan population and it has become very difficult for people living in the provinces to get permission to move to Moscow. Apartment space is allocated on a rigidly graded scale — at least in theory. A university professor, for instance, is entitled by law to two rooms of specified dimensions. If his wife is also doing scientific work, she is entitled to two additional rooms. The combination is a hypothetical four-room apartment plus kitchen, bath, etc. The only problem that remains is the purely physical one of finding the space. At present it is usually insoluble. At this point private enterprise may rear its ugly head and the professor may succeed in subletting an apartment at six or seven hundred roubles a month instead of the one hundred which the original lessee is paying to the State. It is safe to say that even those people who were fortunate enough to have had a four or five room apartment before the war are now living in unhygienically crowded conditions, for they all seem to be surrounded by a host of poor relations. Lower down in the scale the crowding is still worse, of course, and the resulting congestion is one of the militiamen's most difficult problems, since they are apparently expected to reduce it. "As soon as a family gets a proper apartment", one of them complained, "their relations swarm in like bedbugs and what can we do about it?" It would be a mistake to suppose, however, that this overcrowding is anything like the hardship to a Russian family (or to an Italian or an Icelandic family, for that matter) that it would be to a Canadian. In many cases it is a matter of choice. What the average Russian could not bear to contemplate would be the horror of having to live alone.

6. As long as the standard of living continues to improve, however gradually, there is not likely to be acute discontent with the regime. The Russian people are satisfied with so little that it is hard for us to imagine it. On the political side their demands are still more modest. They have never known political freedom as we understand it, and except for a few intellectuals they have no idea what it means. Their elections and their Supreme Soviet, which to us seem merely an elaborate farce, they take very seriously. Somehow or other the Government has managed to persuade the average citizen that his vote is extremely important. From talking to ordinary people in different parts of the country I feel sure that it is this conviction, more than the pressure from Party officials, which accounts for the large vote even in the far northern regions where it is not easy to get to the polling stations. The fact that they have no choice of parties or even of candidates does not seem in the least strange to them. It is sufficient to know that if they think a certain candidate has not taken his duties seriously enough, they can stroke out his name on the ballot. More intelligent or better informed people can understand that the single-party system strikes westerners as odd and undemocratic, but seem content with the explanation that the Communist Party is doing everything that could be done, or that it is surely more efficient to have a single party than the confusing multiplicity of parties one finds in a country like France, for instance. Some foreign writers have explained that the present system in the Soviet Union is educational and that as people become more experienced in the exercise of the franchise they will be given more choice. There may be some truth in this, but I can see nothing at present to indicate that the Communist Party plans to share its authority with any other.

7. In spite of the lack of opposition parties, however, the Politburo cannot entirely disregard public opinion. There are other ways in which it can make itself felt than in elections. One of them is in declining production, and to this the Politburo is extremely sensitive. Hence the constant propaganda to explain to the masses that what is being done is in their best interests. This is cleverly done and is generally successful. The ordinary citizen seems genuinely convinced that he has a share in all the great State enterprises, and the recent announcement of the vast new irrigation and power projects has obviously fired the popular imagination, as it was intended to do, in all parts of the country. In the case of the collectivization of agriculture in the Ukraine in the Thirties, however, the Government did not succeed, as Stalin explained to Churchill, in convincing the farmers that it would ultimately be to their advantage. Those who could not be convinced were starved out or transported to Siberia. But such ruthless methods are dangerous to the regime, and if it had not been for the threat from Germany, it is probable that a more gradual transformation would have been preferred. In Great Russia the Bolsheviks were frequently forced to come to terms with recalcitrant groups and they prefer to avoid a showdown if they can. However badly they may gauge Western psychology in their propaganda efforts, it is generally admitted that they understand the psychology of their own people, including the non-Russian races, extremely well. A tremendous effort is constantly being made, by both positive and negative means, to mould public opinion. The intensity of the effort illustrates at once the importance of the task and the difficulty of it.

8. The isolation of the Russian people is about as complete as the Kremlin intends it to be. Soviet citizens can apparently travel to any place they wish within the boundaries of the Soviet Union and they are still nomadic enough to take as full advantage of this as their means permit. Indeed, many seem to travel without much means and for no good reason. They would be no less eager to travel abroad but only very few can get exit visas even for the neighbouring satellite countries. The ban on travel abroad, however, is probably much less felt in such an enormous country with such a great variety of climates, landscapes, languages, and cultures than it would be in most European countries. It is about as difficult for foreigners to obtain entry visas to the Soviet Union as for Soviet citizens to obtain exit visas. A good many cultural or peace delegations come for brief visits, but their programmes are always carefully planned and their contacts with the natives must be relatively few. The Soviet press is, of course, completely controlled and prints only what the authorities want the people to read. Occasionally they reproduce speeches, articles, or diplomatic notes from abroad which come as a surprise to foreigners in Moscow and can hardly be less of a surprise to Soviet readers. It is not easy to guess the reasons for these exceptions to the general rule. For the most part, the Soviet press is extremely dull. It gives a ridiculously distorted picture of the West, and it was refreshing to find that a good deal of this nonsense is received with healthy skepticism. Its half-truths are more frequent and insidious than its untruths, and unfortunately the Western press, and especially the American, provides excellent material for the Soviet propaganda machine. Quotations from senators and congressmen are popular and the most outrageous ones are almost invariably exact translations. Foreign radio programmes are so effectively jammed that they cannot be heard at all in Moscow and only with great difficulty in other parts of the country.

9. All observers in Moscow agree that the Soviet people in all parts of the country in which we have had any contact with them want peace. They suffered horribly in the last war and in the devastated regions particularly are still suffering from its effects. Their losses were enormous and almost everybody one meets has lost one or more close relatives. In a defensive war they would undoubtedly fight and fight well, but unlike the Germans they are not a bellicose people. As Toynbee points out, they have been more aggressed against than aggressing in their history, and many of them have experienced two German invasions and the war of intervention in their own lifetime. If their rulers wanted war, of course, all the vast propaganda machine would be brought into operation to convince them that their country was not the aggressor and that their cause was just, but they are not stupid or uncritical and the Government would have to choose its ground very carefully. A threat from Germany would rally them more quickly around their Government than a threat from any other quarter.

10. Most observers here agree that the Soviet Government does not want to risk war at the present time. Whatever they can get by other methods or by local wars in which they need not become involved, they will, of course, take. They know quite well that they could occupy Western Europe in a comparatively short time but they also know that this would inevitably bring them into conflict with the United States and that their productive capacity is and will remain for a long time much below that of the United States. They know, too, that the industrial progress they have made and the great industrial projects they have planned would be set back for years if they were involved in a World War, and the people as a whole know this just as well as the Kremlin does. It has been argued that if they have decided that war is inevitable it would be much more to their advantage to have it now than later, when Western Europe has built up its defences. This seems logical, but there are no indications at present that they would be willing to take the risk. As far as can be seen in the parts of the country open to us, it appears that just now they have reached a low point, for them, in the number of men they have under arms. They seem to have released a large proportion of their older classes without calling in an equivalent number — perhaps because of the demands on manpower made by the new industrial projects announced last year. It is probable that the deficiency will soon be made up, but if they had expected to be involved in war very soon, it is unlikely that they would have released so many. It is also interesting to note that so far as we can discover no attempt is being made to provide bomb shelters in large cities like Moscow and Leningrad.

11. The peace campaign, as seemed probable from the beginning, is being pressed to the limit. Until recently the propaganda has been reassuring: the broad masses of the people everywhere are opposed to war and will not permit the instigators of war to plunge the world into misery again. Stalin's Pravda interview was less reassuring. Although he said that war was not inevitable, he was not so certain that the people might not be deceived and led into it by the instigators of war. The more intelligent part of the population seems to have taken this as a warning and the recent increase in the military budget must have confirmed it, nor could Stalin's statement that their present military forces were only about half those of their potential enemies have made them feel any more secure. In spite of this, however, the peace campaign continues at full blast in the press and, however insincere it may be, it is not the best preparation for a war mentality and would certainly have to be changed if war in the near future were contemplated. For this reason it is important to watch closely for changes in the propaganda line.

12. The feeling of confidence so obvious last year when the Chinese Nationalists were defeated seems to have ebbed somewhat, partly, no doubt, as a result of the Korean war and partly, perhaps, because the Russians still do not feel very sure of China. From various small pointers observed by Western diplomats here, it seems clear that China is not regarded and does not regard itself as a satellite in the sense that Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary and the rest are satellites. The Russians are still being elaborately careful in how they handle the Chinese and must be secretly grateful for the circumstances which have prevented any closer relationships between the Chinese and the West. Whether they are really afraid of Mao-Tse-Tung turning out to be another Tito, I should not venture to guess, but at least they have not forgotten their great disappointment in Chiang Kai Shek in 1927. It has been suggested, too, that the Russians are by no means averse to having the Chinese wear themselves down a little more on fighting the United Nations in Korea. If having convinced ourselves that Tito, although a Communist, is not such a bad fellow after all, it would not strain our principles too much to discover a few ingratiating traits in Mao-Tse-Tung, (once the Korean business is settled, of course) it would, I believe, worry the Kremlin as much as anything else we could do. At a public lecture recently the speaker asked sarcastically what the West was offering the Asian countries, and answered it as follows:

"The return of the feudal system and the bankers, and such discredited figures as Chiang Kai Shek, Syngman Rhee and Bao Dai, but these offers do not tempt the nationalist populations of Asia."

It costs the Russians nothing to play up nationalism in Asia just as energetically as they crush it in Eastern Europe, but perhaps this game could be made less easy for them.

13. Social conditions in the Far East facilitate the Soviet propaganda effort and so, I fear, do social conditions in the Middle East. It may be that as the Communist parties in Western Europe continue to lose ground, the Soviet Union will decide to concentrate more on Asia. It is clear that unless it becomes involved in war the Soviet Union will make vast progress in industrialization in the next few years. Looked at from Asia the progress of the Soviet Union in the last thirty years is already sufficiently impressive, and if it continues at the present speed it is bound to influence Asian opinion more and more, unless the West can assist the Asian countries to meet their difficult problems more rapidly and effectively than it has been able to do so far.

DESPATCH Moscow, April 13, 1951

PROSPECTS FOR PEACE, AS SEEN FROM MOSCOW

Since taking up my post I have been attempting to form an opinion on this subject, based on the atmosphere in Moscow, a reading of the Soviet press, and discussions with other members of the diplomatic corps. I have also consulted the Military Attaché and the Air Attaché, some of whose views are incorporated in paragraphs 5—8. My conclusions are only tentative, but this interim report on what the situation looks like from the heart of the Russo-Stalinist empire may be of some interest.

2. The striking thing about Moscow at the present time is its complete calm, the absence of any feeling of war hysteria, and the absence of any overt signs of preparation for war. Coming from New York this is all the more striking. I have checked my impressions not only with newly-arrived foreigners, but with diplomats who have been here for some time. The general consensus of opinion is that there has been no organized attempt by the Soviet authorities to prepare the population psychologically for war in the near future. They have prepared the people psychologically to throw the entire blame for an outbreak of war on the western powers. But they have not created the impression that it is in any way imminent. Of course with their skill in propaganda, the Soviet authorities could turn on such a campaign within twenty-four hours.

3. One can argue, of course, that the propaganda line was changed in June, 1941, within twenty-four hours, and that the Soviet authorities had no difficulty in creating the correct atmosphere for waging war. On the other hand the situation was one which any Russian could understand with but little help from the propagandists. Whether it would be so easy to convince the average Russian that he was fighting to defend his homeland in Korea or some other distant spot, I am not so sure. In any case up to now the Soviet authorities have not attempted to create the psychological atmosphere which it seems to me would be necessary if they intended to draw their people into war.

4. The Soviet press continues to belabour the West, particularly the United States, and even we have come in for a good deal of abuse in the last month — usually in the form of articles describing how the ruling circles of Canada have sold the country out to the American warmongers. The propaganda is perhaps more virulent and vicious than it was four years ago, but I do not think it can have any new effect on the Soviet reader, whose senses must be pretty much dulled by the uninterrupted flow of abuse. Perhaps the average Russian is skilled in detecting a new line in the Soviet propaganda, but from a month's reading of the press, and a superficial comparison with that of four years ago I cannot detect any great change of emphasis or direction.

5. The second striking thing about Moscow is the lack of any overt signs of war preparation. This is probably not so important in a country permanently geared to war preparedness as it is in a country like our own. Comparatively little outward change would result from the conversion to a shooting war. If war were imminent some significant changes would doubtless appear, but it may be that the signs would be less obvious up to the actual moment of the commencement of shooting than those which one would see in a peaceful country rapidly converting to war.

6. Nevertheless in Moscow itself, now a city of perhaps seven million inhabitants, there appear to be none of the signs which one would look for even here. Passive air defence is a subject about which nothing has been published and it is difficult to believe that the population could be adequately prepared to sustain air attacks without some sort of training or guidance, and there is no evidence at the moment that steps are being taken in this respect. There appear to be no air-raid shelters, and none under construction. There is a difference of opinion about the adequacy of the Metro system as a shelter against air attack. In the opinion of the Military Attaché much would need to be done to make it useful. The present entrances are very vulnerable from the air and many emergency entrances would have to be built. In addition, the Metro system covers only a limited portion of the town. The Air Attaché thinks, however, that by using the track tunnels themselves, as was apparently done in the last war, a fair percentage of the population could be accommodated.

7. As regards anti-aircraft defence, there are some thirty (estimated) anti-aircraft sites located on the outskirts of Moscow — not a formidable number but in the opinion of the Air Attaché a not insignificant defence. The number does not appear to have changed during the past year. From the location and calibre of the guns in those positions which are known it is probable that they are not intended for more than the inner perimeter defences. Both Service Attachés think there must be more and heavier calibre guns situated further out from the built-up area, and in restricted areas, to serve as the outer perimeter defences. One can see such heavy anti-aircraft guns in a large park on the outskirts of the city where equipment is being concentrated in preparation for the May Day parade.

8. In Leningrad, I am told, new anti-aircraft installations have been sighted, but the air defences of the city do not appear to be complete, and little has been observed in the way of anti-aircraft installations in other cities. The Service Attachés are of the opinion that if war were expected in the immediate future there would be more evidence of the strengthening of the anti-aircraft defences than there is at the present. At the same time the Russians no doubt count on the general superiority in total numbers of Soviet aircraft over those of the western powers to be able to make available large numbers of fighters for the defence of cities like Moscow which are a comparatively great distance from the frontiers. This is reflected in the considerable numbers of fighters on the aerodromes near Moscow.

9. Admiral Kirk, the United States Ambassador, said to me that on his recent visit to Washington he told the officials in the Pentagon that he found no more signs of preparation for an air attack than in Washington, and considerably less than in New York. He considers it inconceivable that the Russians would launch a war without making some provision for the protection of Moscow and its inhabitants, for two reasons. First, the city is too important for the economy and government of the country to risk its destruction from the air. And secondly, in spite of the callousness of the Soviet authorities to human life, they could scarcely be indifferent to the destruction or disablement of the most capable portion of their population.

10. Apart from the absence of obvious physical and psychological preparations for war, there is the fact that the Russians have done a great deal of building in the years I have been away, and are still working on a large number of grandiose projects for the embellishment of Moscow. They are very proud of the new buildings and improvements and it seems to me curious that they would continue to work so hard on these peaceful projects if they plan on a war in the near future. Furthermore there is a relatively large quantity of consumer goods in the shops and no apparent signs of hoarding. Such things as bicycles, motor-cycles, television sets, upholstering materials and other luxury goods are for sale at not unreasonable prices and there is no obvious indication that the number is likely to be reduced.

11. All this information is rather vague and inconclusive but it all helps to form bits of the puzzle and should not in my opinion be neglected.

12. Finally, I should like to report the views of some of the better-informed foreign diplomats on the possibility of maintaining peace. The most pessimistic view, that of Dr. Radhakrishnan, the Indian Ambassador, which I have reported separately in my despatch No. 151 of April 6,† is definitely a minority opinion. Briefly, he thinks that the Russians attach great importance to the question of a Four-Power conference and will consider the willingness of the West to reach an agreement with the U.S.S.R. as a touchstone of their intentions. If the conference fails, he thinks the Russians may very well conclude that since the West does not intend to use its new armaments for diplomacy, then it intends to wage war; and the Russians may decide to forestall this by attacking at a time when they are relatively superior.

13. The United Kingdom, French, United States and Italian Ambassadors and most minor pundits here all believe, however, that the Russians have no intention of making war in the near future. Admiral Kirk thinks the Soviet leaders are fumbling around for some kind of a solution to the impasse. He thinks they are genuinely worried about the dangers of the situation but are not sure how to go about reaching a détente, or in fact on what points they wish to give way in order to reach a compromise.

14. The French Ambassador, M. Chataigneau, thinks this year at least will be spent in pourparlers of one sort or another, an opinion which is shared by Sir David Kelly. Both think the Russians are worried by the size of the opposition that has grown up in North America and Western Europe, but that they are not so panic-stricken as some people suggest, at least not to the extent of reacting impulsively to the continued growth of Western strength. The Italian Ambassador, M. Brosio, equally does not fear a war started by the U.S.S.R. in 1951 or 1952. After that, when western re-armament has reached its height, is the period he foresees as really dangerous, principally because in his view the European economy will not be able very long to stand the strain of supporting large standing armies. But he does not think the Russians are likely to launch a war even under very great provocation.

15. Another minority opinion may be of interest to you — that of the Finnish Minister, Mr. Sundström. He has been in Moscow since September 1945, and knows this country well. Though not a member of the Communist Party, he is pro-Russian and his views are often slightly suspect. On this question, however, what he has to say is not unimportant. He frankly scoffs at the idea that the Russians are frightened by Western re-armament. In his opinion the Soviet leaders are confident in their strength and ability and are not particularly worried by United States re-armament, which they exploit for propaganda purposes but which they explain away on the basis of Marxist economics (see my despatch No. 137 of March 29).† They are more worried by the prospect of German re-armament but they do not yet consider it a serious menace to the Soviet state. (I shall be writing at greater length on this subject in a subsequent despatch.) At the same time they have been greatly encouraged by the increase of Communist strength in China, and by the considerable economic recovery of the U.S.S.R. There have been set-backs for the Soviet Union but Mr. Sundström thinks that on the whole the Soviet leaders are still confident that they would be able easily to repel any invader. He does not believe they would launch a war, but equally he does not think they are particularly afraid that the West may attack them.

16. The theory of Mr. Sundström cannot be dismissed off-hand. We tend too often, I think, to assume that the Russians are frightened of North American and Western European military power, and might decide to forestall the inevitable capitalist attack on the U.S.S.R. by themselves attacking while they had a relative military edge. If Mr. Sundström is correct, the Russians do not want a major war, and are sufficiently confident in their own strength that they can afford to let the West re-arm if it wishes. From then on the weight of re-armament would gradually force the collapse of the economies of the Western European countries, and create the conditions necessary for the overthrow of capitalism without the risk of war. If the West should eventually be so foolish as to attack the U.S.S.R. then the latter is fully competent to handle the situation.

17. To conclude, therefore, the balance of the evidence, and the consensus of opinion, here, is that, barring some unforeseen event, the Russians are not planning on an outbreak of general war in the near future. This does not take into consideration the possibility of further "limited" wars à la Korée, a question which I shall not go into in this despatch. I shall try to gauge the feeling in Moscow on this subject from time to time, and let you know if I detect any important changes.

SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY

1. In my despatch under reference I gave my interpretation of the important speech by Beria on the 34th Anniversary of the Russian Revolution. In this despatch I should like to review briefly recent trends in Soviet foreign policy as they appear to me in Moscow.

2. I have had several recent discussions with the United Kingdom and United States Embassies on this subject and it might be useful first to outline the way they are currently thinking. The United Kingdom Embassy is inclined to believe that the Beria speech and the attitude adopted by the Soviet delegation at the General Assembly in Paris indicate that the Soviet authorities have now abandoned completely the idea of trying new tactics in order to attempt a lessening of international tension with the aim of slowing down Western rearmament. In the United Kingdom view the Soviet authorities have reverted unconditionally to their pre-June, 1951, line of an all-out diplomatic and propaganda attack on the Western powers.

3. Officials of the United States Embassy admitted that they have not done a review of Soviet foreign policy since last July. They defend this on the ground that one was hardly required since Soviet policy is fairly predictable. This does not particularly surprise me, in view of the fact that the United States Embassy has reached a rather low ebb as far as experts in Russian affairs are concerned, and most of the present staff have their minds firmly made up about this country, though I think it is rather unfortunate the Embassy has no-one at this moment with a real knowledge and understanding of Russia.

4. As regards the British thesis, I have no doubt the Russians were putting out feelers a few months ago to see how tactics intended to lessen international tension would be received. The reaction in the West probably convinced them that such tactics were premature since the U.S.S.R. was not then prepared to make any actual concessions to the West. It seems to me the United Kingdom interpretation, however, is a little too categorical, particularly when one recalls that the British were prepared to go a great deal farther than the rest of us last summer in predicting that the U.S.S.R. would adopt a change of tactics.

5. How then can one interpret the "tough" line taken by Beria and Vishinsky this month, and the series of notes to the United States, United Kingdom, France, Italy, Norway, Turkey, Egypt and the other countries of the Near East, all of them extremely truculent and uncompromising? The British answer is that the Russians have abandoned any hope of a more friendly attitude achieving anything.

6. Superficially this certainly seems to be the case, but I wonder if there may not be another explanation. In the West we are convinced that we must build up a position of strength before we can negotiate successfully with the Russians. I think the Russians may be following a similar line of reasoning. They have lost a good deal of ground in the last year and a half, and they may therefore reason that they must create at least the illusion of strength, both internally and externally, before attempting to reach a settlement with the West. If looked at in this light, the Beria and Vishinsky speeches and the threats to other countries fall into this pattern.

7. In other words, the return to a policy of "fear" (cf. my despatch No. 498 of August 22, 1951)† may be only temporary, and may have as its aim the creation of the psychological atmosphere the Russians consider necessary for discussions in which they must know they would have to give more than they received. I think the logic in the argument that some time or another the U.S.S.R. must either decide to carry its present foreign policy through to its logical conclusion of war, or to adopt new tactics aimed at restoring more normal relations with the Western world, slowing down Western rearmament and possibly splitting the Western alliance, is pretty strong. It must be admitted, however, that it is the logic of a westerner trying to put himself in the position of a Russian, and this has often proved fatally wrong in the past.

8. The very brief and clumsy try which the Russians gave the second tactic last summer might indicate that it was agreed to only reluctantly and probably without any real conviction. In any case the San Francisco Conference forced the Russians at the very beginning of their experiment, if such it was, to choose between abandoning traditional Bolshevik tactics at the conference, or their new tactics, and there was never really any chance of their turning from Bolshevik principles.

9. The opponents in Soviet councils of "appeasement" probably argue that the governments of the Western powers are irrevocably committed to anti-Soviet policies, and that the North Atlantic bloc cannot be shaken by direct methods. As a result attempts to slow down rearmament or split the Western alliance by policies aimed at influencing governments are a waste of time. The only way this can be achieved is by threats and direct action by the great masses of the people acting as brakes on their governments. This kind of reasoning is, I am afraid, more likely to appeal to the Soviet Marxist mentality. Otherwise the logic of a policy of appeasement seems to me overwhelming, and particularly more when there is some possibility for the Russians to achieve the aims they surely are after. The longer they put off the adoption of such a policy, the stronger the West will be, and the less likelihood they have of achieving any of their aims. In other words, a policy of appeasement by the Russians now might possibly succeed in slowing down rearmament and splitting the Western alliance. A policy of appeasement after the West has rearmed would be purely a defensive measure to prevent an outright attack on the Soviet Union. If, however, they are convinced the West will not attack them, the Russians might prefer to wait until the burden of rearmament in the West is greater, and then launch a policy of appeasement in order to accelerate the process of economic disintegration in the West.

10. To sum up, it seems to me that Soviet foreign policy at the moment has

(a) temporarily abandoned the policy of appeasement;

(b) returned to a tough line vis-à-vis the West with the aim of frightening the weaker members of the Western alliance, and slowing up the process of consolidation of the North Atlantic bloc in Europe and its extension into the Near East;

(c) attempted to create the feeling of a situation of strength, particularly vis-à-vis its own people in order to return to a policy of appeasement when it feels the psychological moment has come, possibly next Spring.

11. This, of course, is just guess work and I submit my conclusions with the usual admonitions.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], March 1, 1951

FORTHCOMING MEETING OF THE COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS

Before approaching the subject of the coming Four-Power talks in the Council of Foreign Ministers, it may be worth putting on paper a few general considerations concerning negotiation with the U.S.S.R. In the present phase of the international crisis, the Western powers are attempting to follow two lines of policy simultaneously. On the one hand we are actively preparing to wage a defensive war and on the other we are still pursuing negotiations aimed at staying off such a war. The Russians, for their part, appear to be pursuing a similar double policy. While no doubt they are preparing for war, they do not seem to have entirely abandoned the hope of gaining their objectives by out-manoeuvring the West round a conference table.

2. From the point of view of the Western democracies, this duality in policy presents difficult problems and leads to inevitable and sometimes dangerous contradictions. One policy is apt to get in the way of the other. In their attempts to arouse their peoples to a more urgent sense of the danger of the international situation, governments may heighten the very tension which they seek to mitigate by negotiation. On the other hand, by entering into negotiation, the Western governments run the risk that their populations may be lulled into the belief that the danger is past and that no great efforts or sacrifices are needed.

3. The likelihood of a false sense of security arising from negotiation with the Soviet Union is not perhaps at the moment a pressing problem. For the tension has now become so heightened between the Soviet Union and the Western world that any fruitful negotiation is almost excluded. Indeed, the real danger is that we may have passed the point at which genuine negotiation is possible. This increasing improbability of finding a basis for negotiation is in turn partly due to our appreciation of the increasing imminence of war. Questions which even a year ago might have been the subject of negotiation have now to be excluded from compromise because they are seen primarily from the strategic point of view. For example, until quite recently it might have been possible for the United States to envisage a compromise over Formosa, but at present, when the United States estimates that war with Communist China may be imminent, they are unwilling to take any chances over a strategic position which might be valuable to them in war. Similarly, on the Soviet side, there will be an increasing unwillingness to make any concession which their military advisors disapprove. When both sides are thinking in terms of an impending war, no serious progress is likely to be made in negotiation. For this reason, if negotiation is to be successful, it may have to be preceded by a relaxation in the present strained relations between the Soviet Union and the Western democracies.

4. This pessimistic estimate of the possibility of successful negotiation at the present time may not apply in full measure to negotiation with China over Far Eastern problems. There, other considerations are involved — in particular, the possibility that Peking may have interests opposed to those of the Kremlin. It is applicable primarily to negotiation with the Soviet Union over European problems.

5. Apart from negotiations limited either to the Far East on the one hand or to Europe on the other, there are from time to time suggestions that there should be negotiations on the world situation at the highest level — i.e., Truman-Stalin-Attlee talks. Such talks would probably be sterile or even dangerous at the present time. They might be contemplated in one of two sets of circumstances. First, they might take place in the unlikely event that preliminary negotiations with Peking over the Far East or over Europe in the Council of Foreign Ministers had attained a certain measure of success, so that the international tension was relaxed and the ground prepared for a top-level review of the world situation. Even in that event the principle should be steadily maintained that Far Eastern questions should not be discussed with the Soviet Union in the absence of Communist China. Otherwise the Soviet Union would speak for China, thereby increasing the dependency of Communist China on the U.S.S.R.

6. Alternatively, top level meetings might result from an evident and immediate threat of war — e.g., an East German attack on Berlin or a satellite attack on Yugoslavia. There might be widespread public support in the West for a last gasp attempt at direct negotiation with Stalin. It is highly unlikely that a negotiation in such an atmosphere would be productive.

7. To turn from the hypothetical consideration of negotiations with the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, the United States and France are faced with the early prospect of negotiation over European problems with the Soviet Union in the Council of Foreign Ministers. The chief purpose of this paper is to attempt some estimate of the objectives of the Soviet Union and the Western powers in entering upon this negotiation and the possibility of achieving a successful compromise.

Soviet Objectives

8. The paramount Soviet motive in demanding Four-Power talks probably is the prevention of West German rearmament. The Soviet means for attaining this end has already been publicly disclosed. It is to propose a unified and neutralized Germany, from which all Occupation troops have been withdrawn. If the Soviet Government could achieve this result, their maximum objective would have been attained. To gain this end, they might even be willing to make what are often called "genuine concessions" such as the acceptance of free and secret elections throughout Germany. It might indeed seem worth their while to do so, even at the cost of losing their grip on the East German zone, when one considers what the position of a unified and neutralized German government would be. It is true that if elections were free the German Communist Parliamentary representation would be relatively small. It would, however, be more powerful than the West German Communist Party is today in relation to the Bonn Government. Moreover, it is quite doubtful whether the present Adenauer Government would survive all-German elections. Some new and weaker combination, less committed to the West, might come into office. The West German politicians who have publicly accepted the principle of German rearmament and alignment with the West would inevitably be weakened and discredited if the principle of a neutralized Germany were accepted. In this connection it should be emphasized that the West German Government, with every encouragement from the Western Occupying Powers, have already committed themselves very explicitly to the proposition that the neutralization of Germany would mean the absorption of Germany into the Soviet bloc.

9. In the event of the neutralization of Germany, the German masses, with their instinctive respect for power as such, might be expected to turn towards the East and away from the West, which they would feel had retreated in the face of Soviet pressure and abandoned its German supporters. A weak, unstable, inexperienced German Government would be installed in Berlin. The very fact that it was in Berlin and no longer in Bonn would be a physical symbol of the shift of German orientation from West to East. Such a government would, of course, be subjected to continuous Communist pressure within Germany and Soviet pressure upon Germany. It might take some time for this unified and neutralized Germany to drift into the Soviet sphere of influence but its direction would be charted from the day of its creation. If there was any doubt about its eventual destination the Russians could always play their winning card — the offer to return the lost Eastern territories to Germany in exchange for Germany's entry into the Soviet bloc. The Kremlin would, of course, have no hesitation in making such an offer and would have no regard for the promises they have made to the Poles. Thus the historic martyrdom of Poland for the benefit of Russia and Prussia would once again be re-enacted and Soviet influence would extend to the Rhine with German industry and German manpower finally attached to the Soviet orbit. This has been the nightmare of the Quai d'Orsay ever since the conclusion of the last war.

10. As such a development would so obviously fit the Russian book, the Soviet Government cannot have much anticipation that the Western powers would accept such a proposition. They may, however, hope, as a result of the forthcoming negotiation, to make some progress towards this eventual aim. They could hope to achieve a psychological victory which might be important in softening up West German opinion so as to make the attainment of this aim easier in the end. This they might do if they could convince the West German population that the Soviet Government had put forward sincere proposals for the unification of Germany on democratic lines and for the withdrawal of all occupation troops. It is true that they tried this trick at the last meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers on Germany and on that occasion the West German people did not respond. This time, however, the Soviet Government, as has already been suggested, may be prepared to go much farther in the way of concessions. Moreover, in the interval a new element has been injected into German public opinion in the shape of the rearmament issue. There is no doubt a good deal of genuine resistance to the idea of rearmament in Western Germany. There is also a very lively fear that inadequate rearmament may prove provocative and invite Soviet attack. The idea of neutralization is bound to have a very natural attraction for many Germans who hope to prevent Germany once more becoming the battleground in another war. Even, therefore, if the negotiation broke down without the Soviet Government attaining the objective of a unified and neutralized Germany, it might leave behind it a deeply disturbed and divided public opinion in Western Germany, thus sowing the seeds of trouble for the future.

11. Pressure on West German public opinion is, of course, only part of a vaster Soviet manoeuvre to convince world opinion that the Soviet Government is willing to go more than half-way in making concessions in order to gain its principal avowed objective — world peace — and that it is only thwarted in this aim by the obstructiveness of the Western powers. The forthcoming Council of Foreign Ministers will be used by the Soviet Government as a further occasion to demonstrate this cardinal propaganda point.

12. The Soviet Union has every reason to concentrate attention on the problem of German rearmament and, if possible, to separate this problem from its context of Soviet aggressive policies elsewhere, for the prospect of German rearmament awakens echoes of fear in all of Germany's neighbours, whether free or Soviet-dominated. On this issue — more perhaps than on any other — the Soviet Government can count upon the genuine and unforced support of its European satellites. Meanwhile the hesitations of France over German rearmament have been unfortunately underlined in public by the precipitate and blundering presentation of this issue in the North Atlantic Council. It may be anticipated that Soviet pressure on France as the weakest link in the chain of Occupying powers will be redoubled in the period preceding and during the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers. At the present moment, however, Soviet pressure is focussed on the United Kingdom. The emphasis of Stalin's Pravda interview, followed by the most recent Soviet note to the United Kingdom, seemed dictated by the hope of splitting the British Labour Party on the issue of rearmament. The deeper Soviet motive, however, may be to drive a wedge between the United Kingdom and the United States. Perhaps we may anticipate the compliment of a special initiative of the same kind directed towards Canada. Stalin's specific mention of Canada as bracketed with the United States as a chief aggressor may foreshadow further attention to this country, in which case we shall probably be cast for the role of American satellite No. 1.

13. Indeed, the division of the present Western coalition is a primary — perhaps the primary — objective of Soviet foreign policy. It may be that it takes precedence even over the prevention of German rearmament in Kremlin calculations. Certainly the Soviet Government hopes to capitalize on the issue of German rearmament as that most likely to divide the West and this is no doubt one of their principal reasons for wanting a Four-Power meeting on Germany at this time.

14. Soviet political strategy is of course organized on a global scale. It is not possible to separate Soviet policies in the Far East from Soviet policies in Europe. The Soviet Government is expert in applying indirect pressures at unexpected points. The negotiation in the Council of Foreign Ministers may well be accompanied by such intensified pressures, perhaps at points as remote from each other as Yugoslavia and Indo-China.

Western Objectives

15. As is so often the case in relations between the West and the Soviet Union, the three Western powers have been placed on the defensive by Soviet pressure for a meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers. They have little hope of gaining anything from the forthcoming meeting and foresee considerable difficulty and even danger arising out of the negotiation. In such circumstances the aims of the three Western governments may be restricted to the following:

(a) to prove to their peoples that they are willing to make every effort, however slim its chances of success, to achieve an honourable compromise;

(b) to gain time while hastening their defence preparations;

(c) to attempt in the course of negotiation to penetrate Soviet intentions;

(d) the faint hope that the Soviet Union may be prepared to consider a genuine compromise settlement.

16. As to Western tactics at the Council meeting, the identical notes addressed by the United Kingdom, the United States and France to the Soviet Government have already revealed that their objective will be to widen the ground of discussion to include subjects other than Germany. They have already succeeded in obtaining a grudging Soviet consent to discuss other European issues. The Western powers will attempt to concentrate discussion on the broad topics of aggressive Soviet foreign policy and of heavy Soviet armaments as a threat to the West. They will attempt to put in the forefront of the negotiation such questions as the rearmament of the satellite states and the unjustifiable Soviet record over the Austrian Peace Treaty. The contradiction between Soviet peace protestations and the vast Soviet armed forces gives an obvious opening to Western propaganda. The emphasis which Stalin in his Pravda interview gave to Soviet demobilization suggests that it is worth hammering away at this glaring inconsistency.

17. Over the question of Germany, one of the principal objects of the Western negotiators should be to return to the offensive and to put forward their own plan for German unification on democratic lines and to make such a plan appear both genuine and attractive to the Germans. This may be very difficult if the Soviet Government is willing to make substantial concessions over such questions as free elections. Moreover, the Western powers cannot match the Soviet proposal for the neutralization of Germany. To do so would mean the withdrawal of Western Occupying forces. The probable consequences of such a policy at this time have already been indicated and it is to be presumed that the Western powers have no intention of following it. This, however, does not solve the dilemma in which they will find themselves from a propaganda point of view, if the Soviet Government offers to withdraw its forces from Eastern Germany. Various proposals have been suggested in different quarters which the Western powers might put forward in an attempt to counter the Soviet position. One of these was canvassed in a recent article in The Economist, which proposed that the "Austrian solution" might be applied to Germany — i.e., that there might be nationwide democratic elections in Germany leading to a unified government but that all four Occupying powers should continue to maintain Occupation forces in their respective zones. The Economist argues that the advantage of such a proposal would be that the Western powers would have made a positive proposal for German unification while at the same time avoiding the dangers implicit in the withdrawal of the Occupation forces.

18. Another suggestion has been put forward by Mr. Walter Lippman, who is in fact reviving an old idea when he proposes that Occupation troops should be withdrawn from a wide central zone in Germany to the German borders and that within unoccupied Germany a unified and democratically elected government should be established, accompanied by the neutralization of Germany.

19. Such ideas and other compromise solutions are worth considering if the Western powers are not to restrict themselves in the forthcoming negotiation to the purely negative process of demonstrating the insincerity of the Soviet proposals. One cannot, however, be very optimistic about reaching real agreement with the Russians on the basis of either of the two suggestions noticed above.

20. The West German Government have already emphasized that they desire to be kept in close touch by the Western Occupying powers with the progress of a negotiation which so closely affects their destinies. They may even propose that they should be represented at the Council meeting when Germany is under discussion. In any case, it will be essential for the Western powers to keep continually in mind the views of the West German Government and the reactions of West German opinion to the proposals before the Council, for this session of the Council will develop into a struggle to influence German opinion.

21. The question of timing is important in relation to the forthcoming meeting, both from the Soviet and the Western point of view. It has already been suggested that the timing of the Soviet demand for a meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers has no doubt been carefully calculated in relation to Soviet moves in other parts of the world. From the Western point of view it would appear desirable to spin out the forthcoming negotiation over the spring and perhaps the early summer. If the Council meeting does not collapse entirely, the Council might adjourn and meet again later. In any case it may be as well for the West to keep in diplomatic negotiation with the Soviet Government at a high level during this period, which is estimated to be a dangerous one from the viewpoint of a possible Soviet attack in Europe. It is always possible, of course, that the breakdown of negotiation might be the signal for such a Soviet attack, although this seems somewhat unlikely.

22. The appraisal attempted in this paper does not leave much room for optimism about the outcome of the Council meeting. It seems more than doubtful that agreement could be reached on the unification of Germany at this time. Perhaps the most that could be hoped for from the forthcoming negotiation might be a tacit agreement to disagree, if this were accompanied by a relaxation in the present tension. It might be just possible to envisage the setting up of a Working Group to explore some of the problems arising out of the Council meeting pending further consideration by the full Council. If this were accompanied, for example, by a relaxation of Soviet pressure on Yugoslavia and a more accommodating atmosphere in other spheres, and perhaps on the Western side by a slowing up of the tempo of German rearmament, it might produce an atmosphere of détente in which further and more productive negotiation could take place. Such a development seems a fairly remote contingency. Yet the Western powers must recognize that a divided Germany is a continuing threat to the peace of Europe and that German rearmament is not in itself a desirable phenomenon. While not abandoning the hope of attaining a modus vivendi, they cannot, however, at this stage and in the present atmosphere consent to the creation of a unified and neutralized Germany from which the Occupation forces have been withdrawn. To do so would be to invite the collapse not only of the West German Government but of the whole North Atlantic Treaty structure in Europe.

23. So far as the Canadian attitude towards these negotiations is concerned, while we will not of course be directly involved it looks as though we might have a more satisfactory opportunity to contribute our views on the forthcoming Council session than we have had in the past. The political discussions in the North Atlantic Council Deputies may give an opportunity for an interchange of ideas to which Deputies of the North Atlantic Treaty Governments, other than the three Occupying powers, can contribute. The Occupying powers have already circulated to the Council Deputies their communications in reply to the Soviet Government's note regarding the Four-Power meeting. The Deputies have on their agenda an item which involves discussion of the line which the three Occupying powers propose to take at the Council of Foreign Ministers. The North Atlantic Council itself, according to our latest information, will not in all probability be meeting until after the Council of Foreign Ministers has met.

24. At previous sessions of the Council of Foreign Ministers, Canadian views have been communicated through the diplomatic channel in Paris, London and Washington. While they have often contained sound ideas, they have too often taken the form of a generalized essay, which has made little impression on those busy with the day to day work of negotiation in the Council of Foreign Ministers. On this occasion, if there is any extended preliminary discussion in the Deputies of the subject matter of the Four-Power talks, we may have an opportunity to communicate our views to Mr. Wilgress from time to time as the discussion develops. In this way the Canadian point of view may be brought to the attention of the three Occupying powers in a more precise and realistic fashion than in the past.

The Cabinet directive of May 9, 1950, and a subsequent modification, provided that travel documents may only be given to Canadian dual nationals in Yugoslavia whose return to Canada would not be contrary to the public interest.[1] This policy has resulted in great administrative difficulties and for months past the Legation at Belgrade has been over-taxed in screening applicants and trying to determine whether or not they have recanted their former Communist faith. In many cases, it has been virtually impossible for the Legation to reach any firm conclusion.

2. The difficulties have recently been accentuated by an apparent modification of Yugoslav policy whereby exit permits which formerly were only rarely granted are now being given somewhat more freely. Up to now, we have been able to make a more or less stock reply to enquiries from relatives in Canada, basing ourselves on the unwillingness of the Yugoslav Government to cooperate. It is evident, however, that we cannot continue to do so and will sooner rather than later have to admit that it is not the Yugoslav Government but the Canadian Government which is preventing the return of the people concerned.

3. A further difficulty arises from the fact that the United States and the United Kingdom are treating their nationals in Yugoslavia primarily as their own citizens irrespective of whether or not they are dual nationals in law.

4. As the Canadian Citizenship Act stands, and under any foreseeable amendment, there is no prospect of any of these persons being deprived of their citizenship during the next two years, or of natural-born citizens losing their Canadian status.

5. From the security standpoint the risk involved in the readmission of these people may be regarded as being of minor degree.

6. It is concluded therefore that the balance of advantage lies in adhering to the generally recognized principle of treating dual nationals like all other citizens by granting them travel documents to permit them to leave the country of other nationality to return to Canada. Approval of this policy, however, would not preclude reference to Cabinet for authority to refuse travel documents in exceptional cases where the security risks involved were known to warrant such action.

7. This memorandum has been concurred in by all the interested divisions of the department, i.e., European, Consular and Defence Liaison (2).[2]

You will see my notes on the attached memorandum of January 29th for the Minister regarding Canadian dual nationals in Yugoslavia.

2. Subject to assurance in each case that Immigration authorities will admit individual applicants to Canada, the Minister is prepared to have an administrative instruction given to our Legation in Belgrade to accept applicants in this category unless there is specific reason for concluding that they are likely to engage in subversive activities in Canada. That is, we may revert to the previous regime under which our attitude was that there was a prima facie case for acceptance defeasible by evidence of undesirability.

3. Mr. Pearson is, however, unhappy at the criticism which he feels sure will result if we facilitate the return to Canada of those whose activities in the past have been subversive, even if we have reason to think that they have recanted their former views.

4. Mr. Pearson wishes us to make sure that our Legation in Belgrade has available all the information that there is in the government's possession concerning Communist activities by persons in this category.

5. The Minister wishes us to ascertain whether the Yugoslav authorities are prepared to facilitate the surrender in such cases of Yugoslav citizenship.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], June 13, 1951

The Amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act which became law on May 31, 1951, raise a number of problems in connection with the naturalized Canadians of Yugoslav origin who returned to that country on the Radnik during 1947. It is now possible, under the new provisions to revoke the citizenship of any person who

"(d) has, since becoming a Canadian citizen or being naturalized in Canada, been for a period of not less than two years ordinarily resident in a foreign country of which he was a national or citizen at any time prior to his becoming a Canadian citizen or being naturalized in Canada and has not maintained substantial connection with Canada;"

Almost all the Radnik expatriates would be covered by this section or by other sections of the Citizenship Act as now amended.

It was anticipated in the Cabinet Minute of May 3† that this problem might be dealt with by yourself together with the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and that the Security Panel could then be consulted if this were thought desirable. I believe, however, that the matter can be settled in your absence by agreement between the appropriate officers of the two Departments concerned and the R.C.M.P. I suggest that in general we bear the following points in mind in dealing with this subject.

It may not be desirable to apply the new regulations too strictly. As you know, these amendments are retroactive. Therefore, those dual nationals now in Yugoslavia who have a claim to Canadian Citizenship have not been given any warning of the necessity to protect their status under the Act as now amended. Many of these people have Canadian-born children, many of them have had their applications for travel documents held up by our present procedures for dealing with these cases, and most of them would not represent any serious security risk if allowed to return to this country. In addition the political situation has changed so much since 1947 that relations between Canada and Yugoslavia are now on an entirely different basis.

Therefore apart from the new administrative arrangements which will have to be established, I suggest that we continue to deal with this problem much as we have done up to the present by allowing the return of those naturalized Canadians of Yugoslav origin who would not constitute a serious subversive risk in Canada. There will of course be some cases where we will wish to begin revocation proceedings immediately and our attitude towards those who apply to the legation in Belgrade will be much more strict in the future than it has been up to the present. But I believe that it would be unreasonable to revoke indiscriminately the citizenship of the Radnik dual nationals.[3]

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], July 23, 1951

I attach a memorandum outlining provisional agreement between External Affairs, Citizenship and Immigration and R.C.M.P. on the procedure to be followed in implementing Section 19(1)(d) of the newly amended Canadian Citizenship Act which reads as follows:

"19(1) The Governor in Council may, in his discretion, order that any person other than a natural born Canadian citizen shall cease to be a Canadian citizen if, upon a report from the Minister, he is satisfied that the said person either ...

(d) has, since becoming a Canadian citizen or being naturalized in Canada, been for a period of not less than two years ordinarily resident in a foreign country of which he was a national or citizen at any time prior to his becoming a Canadian citizen or being naturalized in Canada and has not maintained substantial connection with Canada;"

2. You will recall that this amendment was designed to allow action to be taken to prevent the return to Canada of Canadian citizens with unfavourable security records who had left this country to reside in the country of their former nationality.

3. The administrative application of Section 19(1)(d) presents no difficulties in general, but its application to those Canadian-Yugoslav dual nationals who returned to Yugoslavia on the Radnik in 1947 and 1948 requires special consideration. There appears to be no doubt that the effect of Section 19(1)(d) in this respect is to substitute a procedure, based on statutory requirements, within the competence of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration for an administrative practice dependent upon the exercise of the Royal Prerogative at the instance of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If you concur, therefore, it is proposed that hereafter the denial of travel documents to Canadian citizens in Yugoslavia as in all other Communist countries will, in this context, be based upon the results of the proceedings in revocation and if it is decided that the citizenship of a person in this category is not to be revoked that decision will constitute sufficient grounds for granting the passport in the usual manner.[5]

4. You will notice from paragraph 3 of the attached memorandum that the Registrar undertook to obtain his Deputy Minister's agreement to permitting Canadian-Yugoslav cases, concerning which Defence Liaison had already reached a favourable decision regarding the granting of travel facilities, to proceed as usual. Late

Friday afternoon just before his Deputy Minister proceeded on leave (until August 1) the Registrar reported that Mr. Fortier would prefer that we withhold the granting of travel facilities (passports of "returning Canadian" visas) until such time as the manner of implementing Section 19(1)(d) had been finally decided upon by his Minister in consultation with Mr. Pearson, even though our decisions may, in individual cases, have been reached some time ago. If you concur with this point of view, I should be grateful if you would initial the attached draft telegram† to Belgrade.[6] As there have been cases in which Canadian-Yugoslav dual nationals have had favourable R.C.M.P. reports, provision has been made for special consideration for these particular individuals for whom the withholding of travel facilities may well cause great hardship.[7] Although permitting such persons to return without the institution of revocation proceedings is contrary to paragraph 2 (a) of the attached memorandum, I do not consider that any harm would result. I should add that Mr. Fortier has still an open mind about reference of persons under 19(1)(d) to a Commission for Inquiry when their R.C.M.P. reports are clear, although the Registrar was definitely instructed by him to press for agreement at our meeting for the reference of all cases to a Commission to which we provisionally acquiesced with reluctance.[8]

Approved. July 27 A.D.P.H[eeney]

2. Provisional agreement was indicated, subject to approval of the Departments concerned, on the following points and procedures which are of interest to External Affairs:

(a) Section 19(1)(d) will be invoked against all Canadian citizens abroad (other than national born) who are found to have resided for a period of not less than two years in the country of their former nationality when that country is the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Roumania, Albania, Yugoslavia or China.

(b) Section 19(1)(d) will not ordinarily be invoked against Canadian citizens who reside in the country of their former nationality when that country is not included in (a) above except in the event that there is reason to believe that the conduct of such persons is prejudicial to the best interests of Canada.

(c) Whenever persons falling within (a) and the exception noted in (b) come to the attention of Canadian posts abroad, an appropriate report will be made by them to the Registrar of Canadian Citizenship in order that revocation proceedings may be instituted. Any travel documents which such persons may have in their possession at that time will not, as a rule, be impounded until their citizenship is revoked. However, new passport facilities will not be granted unless the Revocation Commission recommends against revocation in which event they will be extended in the normal manner.

(d) Persons coming within (b) above concerning whom a post has no derogatory information may be informed, should they enquire, that so long as their conduct is not prejudicial to the best interests of Canada they will have no occasion to apprehend that Section 19(1)(d) will be invoked against them.

(e) When reporting to the Registrar of Canadian Citizenship in accordance with (c), posts will, as usual provide External Affairs with a copy of their letters. If External Affairs has a file (other than a passport file) on the person concerned it will, with the Under-Secretary's approval, be forwarded on the basis of administrative convenience to the Registrar for information. The Registrar will obtain a security report from the R.C.M.P. and request the post to serve a Notice of Intention to Revoke. In due course a Commission for Inquiry will be held (unless one is not requested by the person concerned) and a decision reached on revocation of citizenship. In the case of persons of (former) Yugoslav nationality, however, when forwarding the Notices of Intention the Registrar will also ask Belgrade to interview them and express an opinion on their political views and possible future subversive tendencies. In order to assist Belgrade in making this assessment, a summary of the R.C.M.P. report will also be furnished. Reports from Belgrade and the contents of External Affairs files will be treated by the Registrar (and the Commission) in the same manner as full security reports provided by the R.C.M.P.

3. Mr. Duggan undertook to secure his Deputy Minister's agreement to withholding the operation of Section 19(1)(d) in the case of those Canadian-Yugoslav dual nationals who left Canada on the Radnik for whom External Affairs had, before July 21, 1951, decided to authorize travel facilities under previously established criteria.

4. External Affairs suggested that, since Yugoslavia is no longer considered an Iron Curtain country and since the relationship of that country with the Western nations has improved since 1948, it should not be necessary to treat the Canadian-Yugoslav dual nationals in exactly the same manner as the nationals of Cominform countries for the purposes of Section 19(1)(d). In his letter of July 10,† the Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration expressed provisional agreement with that point of view which was set forth in the External Affair's letter of June 27.† However, the Registrar of Canadian Citizenship indicated at the meeting that after the Deputy Minister's letter had been sent the latter had indicated to him that he wished all these cases to be referred to a Commission for Inquiry. In discussion, External Affairs indicated that it had contemplated a procedure whereby Citizenship and Immigration could decide not to submit those cases to a Commission where the persons' records showed that they had not been active communists before leaving Canada and who on return would not be likely to constitute a serious security risk. In advancing this view, External Affairs had in mind the idea of preserving a degree of continuity between the criteria under which the refusal of passport facilities for return to Canada has been based up to now through the exercise of the Royal Prerogative and the criteria which would govern revocation in the future under statutory requirements. It is, however, appreciated that, as Yugoslavia is still a communist state, it may be difficult for Citizenship and Immigration, which is, since the amendment of the Canadian Citizenship Act, vitally concerned with domestic reaction to the return of these people, to reflect in its decisions the important change which has taken place in the international scene.

5. The meeting also discussed the security problems which would arise when the Commission for Inquiry began to consider evidence supplied by the R.C.M.P. and agreed that these could best be worked out by direct consultation between the R.C.M.P. and Citizenship and Immigration.

SECRET AND PERSONAL Ottawa, September 6, 1951

My dear Laval [Fortier],

I am venturing to write you quite personally on a subject which I had hoped to bring over to you for discussion but have found it difficult to do so.

I understand that in my absence there were considerable discussions about the method of implementing Section 19(1)(d) of the Canadian Citizenship Act as amended at the last session. Since my return to Ottawa we have been trying here to draw up some sort of proposed procedure by which cases coming under this Section could be dealt with in a way acceptable to both our Departments. We have evolved the attached as a first draft.

I realize, naturally, that the implementing of this legislation comes entirely within your sphere and I approach the subject in consequence with a good deal of diffidence. You will understand, however, that the External interest in this matter is by no means academic. We are charged with the inescapable responsibility for the protection of Canadian citizens abroad and that, of course, inevitably embraces the provision of travel documents. It is, generally speaking, exceedingly difficult for our officers to refuse travel facilities to Canadian citizens, particularly when such facilities are required to return to Canada, to which country Canadian citizens have after all an inalienable right of admission. It is, in my own personal view, very doubtful if we are on very substantial ground in refusing travel documents even to those Canadian citizens whose citizenship is the subject of revocation proceedings. My doubts are greatly enhanced unless we are able to demonstrate that revocation procedures operate swiftly to conclusion. In short, we cannot go on refusing travel facilities to Canadian citizens over long periods of months on the ground that the revocation of their citizenship is under consideration. Very broadly, a citizen of a country is entitled to travel documents from his country so long as he remains a citizen of that country.

Subject to the above, I do not think that any very serious difficulties would arise for External out of the submission to a Commission of Enquiry of all cases of Canadian citizens coming under this Section who have been residing in Iron Curtain countries for two years or more. In such cases our interest is a good deal less than it is concerning those which arise in countries outside the Iron Curtain. Even in Iron Curtain countries, however, we must obviously provide for adequate consideration in special cases and there is always the over-riding importance of swift justice.

Yugoslavia presents a special and peculiar problem at this time. However, one aspect of the Yugoslav case is clear. We can scarcely go on regarding Yugoslavia as an Iron Curtain country. I was, as you know, in Belgrade in June and I saw a number of the Canadian-Yugoslav dual nationals who want to come back. I can only say about them that while there are doubtless some bad actors among them the vast majority are disillusioned dupes whose security importance must be very slight indeed. They present a considerable and pressing problem to the very small Mission staff. From 9.00-1.00 daily, except on Saturdays, they crowd the one outer office and, of course, each one has to be dealt with carefully and at some length. They take up the full time of an Officer who is, incidentally, the only Officer at the Mission besides the Chargé. I am sure that you will agree that we have to devise some means acceptable to both Departments by which we can clean up quickly this particular aspect of the problem.

I have ventured to write you in this quite personal way and to send you the attached in the hope that you will be good enough to give it your personal consideration and to let me know when it would be convenient for us to get together and perhaps discuss it in a somewhat more official atmosphere.

With kindest regards.

Yours sincerely,

LESLIE CHANCE

PROPOSED PROCEDURE FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF SECTION 19(1)(D) OF THE CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

Reference: Memorandum of July 23, 1951 regarding the implementation of Section 19(1)(d).

It is recommended that:

(a) Section 19(1)(d) be ordinarily invoked against Canadian citizens (other than natural born) who are found to have resided for a period of not less than two years in the country of their former foreign nationality when that country is: the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Roumania, Albania and China;

(b) Section 19(1)(d) be not ordinarily invoked against those persons who reside in the country of their former foreign nationality when that country is not included in (a) above except in the event there is reason to believe that the conduct of such persons is prejudicial to the best interests of Canada;

(c) Whenever persons falling within (a) and the exception noted in (b) come to the attention of Canadian posts abroad, an appropriate report should be made by them to the Registrar of Canadian Citizenship in order that revocation proceedings may be instituted; travel documents already in their possession should not be impounded (until their citizenship is revoked) but new passport facilities should not be granted to them unless the Revocation Commission recommends against revocation;

(d) Persons coming within (b) above concerning whom a post has no derogatory information may be informed, should they enquire, that as long as their conduct is not prejudicial to the best interests of Canada they will have no occasion to apprehend that Section 19(1)(d) will be invoked against them; and

(e) When reporting to the Registrar of Canadian Citizenship in accordance with (c), posts should, as usual, provide the Department of External Affairs with a copy of their correspondence. (If External Affairs has a file, other than a Passport file, on the person concerned it will, with the Under-Secretary's approval, be loaned to the Registrar for information, the file being treated by the Registrar in the same manner as security reports received from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police).

2. It is further recommended that Section 19(1)(d) be invoked against Canadian citizens (other than natural born) of former Yugoslav nationality who have resided in Yugoslavia for a period of not less than two years but that a different procedure be followed from that set forth in paragraph 1 above.

3. The procedure envisaged by paragraph 2 is as follows:

(a) The Embassy in Belgrade will report to the Department of External Affairs those persons falling within Section 19(1)(d) who come to their attention;

(b) The Department of External Affairs will secure from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police a security report and will then present the case to an ad hoc interdepartmental committee, composed of representatives of the Departments of Citizenship and Immigration and External Affairs and R.C.M.P., which will decide:

(i) that on security grounds the individual does not constitute a serious risk; or

(ii) that the individual does constitute a serious security risk; or

(iii) that more information is required before a decision can be reached;

(c) The Department of External Affairs will, in the event of a decision under (b)(i) above, instruct Belgrade to grant travel facilities;

(d) The Registrar will, if the decision of the committee comes under (b)(ii) or (b)(iii), provide the Department of External Affairs with a Notice of Intention to Revoke. The Department will forward the Notice to the Embassy together with a summary of the R.C.M.P. report. The Embassy will serve the Notice and interview the individual, returning the completed Questionnaire and a report of the interview to the Department;

(e) The Department of External Affairs will, when report and Questionnaire are received from Belgrade forward them direct to the Registrar for further action when the case comes within (b)(ii); if the case is one falling within (b)(iii), these documents will be presented to the ad hoc committee to assist the determination of their final decision prior to forwarding them to the Registrar for retention.

The Department of External Affairs will not authorize travel facilities for persons coming within paragraph 2 unless a favourable decision is reached under 3(b) or the Revocation Commission recommends against revocation.

4. As a matter of interest it should be noted that, up to the end of June 1951, 313 Canadian Citizens who went to Yugoslavia on the Radnik have been granted travel facilities to return to Canada. There is another group of some 40 to 60 persons whose return has been authorized but who may not yet have been granted "Returning Canadian" visas. Of the latter group some individuals had, before July 28, been informed that authorization for their return had been granted. As the Mission reported that to suspend these particular authorizations would result in great hardship, instructions were sent to Belgrade permitting "Returning Canadian" visas to be issued to them. It is recommended that the suspension of the remainder of the authorizations granted by the Department of External Affairs to the second group be lifted. It should be added that, since July, External Affairs has not made any decisions on new cases or those old ones which had not by that time been fully processed.

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs and Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 383-51 Ottawa, October 5, 1951

REVOCATION OF CITIZENSHIP UNDER SECTION 19(1)(D) OF THE CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

1. Section 19(1)(d) of the Canadian Citizenship Act was amended this year to enable revocation proceedings to be taken after two years' absence from Canada (instead of six as formerly), in the case of the person who returned to the country of which he was a national or citizen prior to becoming a Canadian citizen or being naturalized in Canada, and who failed to maintain substantial connection with Canada.

2. Careful thought has been given to the extent to which this provision should be invoked, and it is recommended that:

(a) Section 19(1)(d) be ordinarily invoked against Canadian citizens (other than natural born) who are found to have resided for a period of not less than two years in the country of their former foreign nationality when that country is: the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Roumania, Albania and China;

(b) Section 19(1)(d) be not ordinarily invoked against those persons who reside in the country of their former foreign nationality when that country is not included in (a) above except in the event there is reason to believe that the conduct of such persons is prejudicial to the best interests of Canada;

(c) Whenever persons falling within (a) and the exception noted in (b) come to the attention of Canadian posts abroad, appropriate report shall be made by them to the Registrar of Canadian Citizenship in order that revocation proceedings may be instituted; travel documents already in their possession should not be impounded (until their citizenship is revoked) but new passport facilities should not be granted to them unless it is decided not to revoke;

(d) Persons coming within (b) above concerning whom a post has no derogatory information may be informed, should they enquire, that as long as their conduct has been and continues to be in the best interests of Canada they need have no occasion to apprehend that Section 19(1)(d) will be invoked against them; and

(e) When reporting to the Registrar of Canadian Citizenship in accordance with (c), posts shall, as usual, provide the Department of External Affairs with a copy of their correspondence. (If External Affairs has a file, other than a Passport file, on the person concerned it may with the Under-Secretary's approval, be loaned to the Registrar for information, the file being treated by the Registrar in the same manner as security reports received from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police).

3. A special problem exists with respect to Yugoslavia which, although not considered to be an "Iron Curtain" country, is, nevertheless, Communist. In May, 1947, and November 1948, approximately 2,000 Yugoslav nationals and Canadian citizens of Yugoslav origin proceeded to Yugoslavia under a reparation scheme sponsored by the Council of Canadian South Slavs. Of this number roughly 1,200 were Canadian citizens, either natural-born or naturalized.

4. On May 4, 1950, by Cabinet directive, instructions were given that nothing should be done to facilitate the return to Canada of those Yugoslav dual nationals who proceeded to Yugoslavia on the S.S. Radnik, except in cases where their return would be useful from the national point of view. Up to the end of June, 1951, three hundred and thirteen of these persons had been granted travel documents (passports or returning Canadian visas) to enable them to return to Canada. The return of an additional group of some 40 to 60 persons has been authorized, but they may not yet have been granted "returning Canadian" visas.

5. It is recommended that Section 19(1)(d) be invoked in the case of persons of Yugoslav origin and administered as follows:

(a) The Embassy in Belgrade (or other post abroad) shall report to the Department of External Affairs those persons falling within Section 19(1)(d) who come to their attention;

(b) The Department of External Affairs shall obtain from the R.C.M.P. a security report on each such case, and, along with any pertinent information available on its own files, transmit same with whatever comments are considered appropriate concerning the individual to the Registrar of Canadian Citizenship, in order that consideration may be given to the question of instituting proceedings for the revocation of Canadian citizenship;

(c) Should it be decided not to take revocation proceedings, the Department of External Affairs shall be so advised and may then authorize the granting of a "returning Canadian" visa;

(d) Should it be decided to take revocation proceedings the Registrar of Canadian Citizenship shall provide the Department of External Affairs with a Notice of Intention to Revoke. The Department of External Affairs shall forward the notice to the Embassy in Belgrade, or other post, with a summary of the R.C.M.P. report. The notice shall be served and the individual interviewed, following which the completed questionnaire and report of interview shall be transmitted to the Department.

(e) The Department of External Affairs shall, when reports and questionnaires are received, forward them with whatever comments are considered appropriate direct to the Registrar for action, and in the meantime will not authorize the granting of travel documents.

6. The R.C.M.P. report they have not the staff to make a complete check of their records within a reasonable time of all those naturalized Canadians who returned to Yugoslavia on the S.S. Radnik. Any Canadian citizen arriving at a Canadian port would have to be admitted whether or not he had been granted a "returning Canadian" visa. However, the Canadian Citizenship Act provides for the automatic loss of Canadian citizenship in the case of naturalized persons after six years' absence, unless protected in accordance with the provisions of the Act. This six-year period will have elapsed in the case of these former Yugoslav nationals in May, 1953, and November, 1954.[10]

DÉBLOCAGE DES ACTIFS
RELEASE OF ASSETS

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

YUGOSLAV ASSETS — RELEASE BY CANADIAN CUSTODIAN

The Yugoslav Request — Recent Developments

We have received two calls in recent weeks, one by the Yugoslav Minister and another by one of his officials, each asking that Yugoslav assets still held by the Canadian Custodian should be released. (These assets amount to approximately $330,000.) They have been met sympathetically but told that immediate action may be difficult because it may not be possible to dissociate the release of Yugoslav assets from the release of Italian assets and the latter subject is tied up with extensive negotiations with the Italian authorities. We must however give some more definite information to the Yugoslavs very soon.

2. You will recall that the Yugoslavs have asked for release of their assets intermittently since 1945. However, until recently Yugoslavia was considered to be an "iron curtain country" and as a matter of general policy no releases were made to such countries.

3. The situation is now changed in two respects. First, Yugoslavia has split off from the other iron curtain countries. Second, unlike other governments of iron curtain countries, the Yugoslav Government has agreed to make payments to Canadians whose property has been taken over under postwar nationalization policies. An agreement on this subject was reached between the United Kingdom and

[10] Approuvé par le Cabinet le 31 octobre 1951./Approved by Cabinet, October 31, 1951.

Yugoslavia, the United Kingdom acting on behalf of other Commonwealth countries including Canada. As a result of these changes I assume that you would wish our Custodian to release Yugoslav assets as quickly as he can. Would you please confirm that this is so?[11]

The Position of Negotiations with Italy

4. The complication in the situation, and the possible cause for further delay, arises from the position of Italian assets held by the Custodian. As you know, there have been prolonged negotiations on this subject dating back to 1947. The release of assets is related by the Peace Treaty to the settlement of Canadian war claims against Italy. In addition the Italians have made their settlement of our military relief claim dependent upon a satisfactory agreement relating to the release of assets.[12]

5. Just over two months ago our Ambassador in Rome put forward a final Canadian proposal for a lump-sum settlement of war claims to be associated with immediate release of Italian assets. We were not at all hopeful that the Italians would accept the settlement we proposed, and our Ambassador has heard informally that they are going to turn it down. In retrospect it is probably true to say that there was no lump-sum figure on which agreement could have been reached, having regard to the protection which the Canadian Government had to give to Canadians with war claims, and having regard to the protection which the Italian Government had to give to Italians affected by these claims.

6. In anticipation of a formal turndown Canadian officials have agreed on the next step, for submission to Cabinet. Canadian claims would be handled through exactly the same procedures as are being applied to United States and United Kingdom claims. A formal release of Italian assets held by the Custodian would be announced but the Italians would be warned that releases were most unlikely to outrun settlements of Canadian war claims. It is believed that this proposal would be satisfactory to the Italians.[13] In short we may well be very close to the end of these prolonged and often acrimonious negotiations. It must be admitted that while a good deal of the difficulties and delays may be attributed to the Italians a most important cause of the delay has been our own insistence[14] on trying to get a lump-sum settlement which lies outside the terms of the Peace Treaty.

Three Possible Courses of Action

7. If we now announce the release of Yugoslav assets the Italians will undoubtedly be upset. As you know, they are very conscious of their position as a partner in the North Atlantic Treaty. Further, there are sections of the Canadian public to which Yugoslavia appears as simply an atheist-communist country. These sections might be concerned if Yugoslavia appeared to get preferred treatment over Italy. Therefore a strong case can be made for delaying the release of Yugoslav assets until a similar announcement might be made in a few weeks; at worst it should be a few months.

8. Alternatively we might proceed with the Yugoslav release and announcement and let the Italian chips fall where they may. After all it seems unfair to penalize the Yugoslavs because of our inability to settle matters quickly with the Italians. Further, although the Italians are now allies, the Yugoslavs were on our side in World War II when the Italians were fighting against us.

9. Another possibility is that we might start releasing Yugoslav assets but make no public announcement about it in the hope that, for the time being at least, the Italians would not hear of it. This might suit the Yugoslav authorities who are under pressure from Yugoslav individuals who want to get at their assets. On the other hand it has not got the political advantages in Yugoslavia or elsewhere that a public announcement of a friendly gesture by Canada would carry; and if our action did leak out to the Italians, as is likely, we would get the worst of both worlds.

10. Would you please advise me which of the following policies the Canadian officials should follow:

(i) Delay the release of Yugoslav assets, and its announcement, until a similar announcement can be made regarding Italian assets. (The Yugoslav authorities could of course be told immediately that the policy was settled in principle but that there would have to be some further slight delay in implementing it).

(ii) Immediate release of Yugoslav assets together with an announcement, regardless of the Italian position.[15]

(iii) Immediate release of Yugoslav assets but with no announcement in the hope that the Italians would not hear of what we were doing.[16]

RE YUGOSLAV ASSETS

You will have seen from the Minister's and my marginal notes on your recent memorandum that Mr. Pearson favours the second course proposed, namely, release of the Yugoslav assets and announcement (irrespective of what may be done about Italy).

2. You will also notice, however, that we think that Désy should have a chance to comment on Italian reactions before action is actually taken. The Minister is not especially worried by this feature in view of the interminable delays of the Italian Government in reaching any settlement with us which will enable us to proceed with lira expenditures in Rome.

3. When the Yugoslav Minister called on Mr. Pearson and me yesterday, Mr. Pearson, when the subject was raised, gave Mr. Pribicevic reason to hope that the Government would act very shortly to release Yugoslav assets in Canada.

Note du chef de la Direction économique pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Head, Economic Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], May 8, 1951

On April 14th you signed a letter to Mr. Stein in which you let him know that this Department has no objection to the release of Yugoslav and Austrian assets with the suggestion, however, that, should he decide on releasing the assets of these countries, it might be advisable not to make a public announcement to that effect until the recent Italian proposal for the settlement of our Article 78 Claims has been examined.

2. In our memorandum which accompanied the letter which you signed, we suggested that you may wish to inform Mr. Pearson and the Yugoslav Minister of the action we were taking in view of Mr. Pearson's personal interest in the matter and the Yugoslav Minister's numerous representations.

3. Mr. Stein has now replied to our letter and points out that it is not the practice of the Custodian's Office to issue a public announcement on proposed releases of assets whether to countries or their nationals and that, in particular, an announcement was not contemplated with respect to the release of Yugoslav and Austrian assets. He does envisage the possibility, however, that the Yugoslav Legation might make some public announcement or comment when the assets begin to be released considering that these assets have been under sequestration for such a long time without, in the Custodian's view any valid reason. Mr. Stein wishes to know if we would consider this possibility of publicity serious enough to warrant the deferment of the releasing process until more is known about the Italian proposal.

4. It would seem that we are meeting Mr. Désy's views, with whom the suggestion of avoiding publicity originated, by not making any announcement from our side and that it would hardly be in order to formally request the Yugoslavs not to do so. Perhaps if you have not already spoken to Mr. Pribicevic, you could tell him, when you do, that in view of negotiations with another country we would appreciate no publicity being given to the release of Yugoslav assets. On the other hand if you have already informed him of pending releases and you think the matter of sufficient importance, you might consider speaking to him again.

5. In our view no particular harm would be done if the Yugoslavs did make an announcement; the releases can hardly be kept secret, but no publicity seems preferable.

6. Would you please let us know, if you speak to Mr. Pribicevic, the result of your conversation and if Mr. Stein may be told to go ahead with the process of releasing Yugoslav and Austrian assets.

A.F.W. PLUMPTRE

P.S. You might wish us to ask Mr. P[ribicevic] to come in and see me, in which case I could convey the information indicated. His first approach, on this matter, was to me, later, however, he raised it with you and the Minister.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, May 25, 1951

Dear Mr. Stein:

We wish to refer to your letter of May 1st† concerning the release of the assets of Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Yugoslavia.

2. It would appear that there is little danger of undesirable publicity being given to a decision to release Yugoslav assets in view of your practice not to make a public announcement on proposed releases and of the recent assurance given us by the Yugoslav Minister in Ottawa that, should the release of his country's assets be approved, it is not his intention to give any publicity to the fact; he further stated that he would make our views known to his Government. Accordingly we see no objection to proceeding with the release of Yugoslav and Austrian assets without waiting for further consideration of the latest Italian proposal.

3. Although we have no very solid legal grounds for continuing to withhold the unrestricted release of Czechoslovak and Polish assets, we do not believe that circumstances have materially changed since it was agreed that only limited releases, under certain conditions, of these assets would be permitted.

4. To date we have received no encouragement that the war damage and nationalization claims of Canadian citizens would be entertained by Czechoslovakia and Poland and, even though the two subjects are not related, in our view we should not make any special effort to ease the present restrictions.

INFORMATION POLICY TOWARDS TITOISM IN SOVIET SATELLITES

Our information policy towards the satellites can be tersely expressed in terms of two basic purposes:

(1) Active participation in the "cold war" against Soviet imperialism and totalitarianism;

(2) The projection of Canada.

In view of the present relations between the satellites and the Western powers, including Canada, the second objective is the less important. It includes explaining Canadian policies and principles and their background, and presenting a picture of Canadian democracy, life, people, industry, etc.

The expression "cold war", for which some authorities would prefer to substitute "ideological struggle" in matters pertaining to information, is retained here as a convenient if imprecise means of grouping a number of points under a general heading and of retaining the picture of a contest leading to victory or defeat, which "cold war" evokes.

Under the heading "cold war" our information policy may be divided into three basic aims:

I—to preserve peace and check the inroads of Soviet imperialism, by

(a) strengthening the morale, faith and determination of our friends in the satellites in their opposition to the Stalinist totalitarian regimes and policies in their countries, and to the Soviet imperialism which makes the regimes possible and which, through them, exploits the satellite peoples;

(b) giving cautious encouragement to Titoist tendencies as outlined more fully below;

(c) undermining the morale, faith and determination of the people in the satellites who actively or passively support Moscow-directed policies;

(d) convincing the satellite peoples of our peaceful, unaggressive purpose;

(e) demonstrating that the Soviet Union and its willing or unwilling allies cannot hope to win a new world war;

(f) presenting the Soviet regime and its obedient satellite regimes as solely responsible for war should it come.

II—to win the war if it comes, towards which the above peace-preservation formula would contribute

III—as a longer-term project, to

(a) help keep alive, in the satellite countries, knowledge and appreciation of liberal democracy and the civilization and code of ethics of the West;

(b) maintain belief in eventual liberation from tyranny and slavery, trying to strike a proper balance between, on the one hand, bolstering the will of the individual to fight for his freedom when the time comes, and checking trends towards fatalistic resignation, and, on the other hand, giving the false impression that liberation is at hand, or encouraging premature and doomed uprisings which would be bloodily suppressed.

The only information medium through which Canada is at present reaching any significant number of people in the satellite countries is short-wave broadcasting. The chief means of furthering the above aims, through this medium, include:

(a) giving an adequate account of what is going on in the world through a news service which is comprehensive, true and objective;

(b) identifying the satellite Communist regimes as the creatures and instruments of Soviet imperialism and as the agents for Soviet exploitation of the satellite nations;

(c) appealing to the national self-respect of subject people, without attempting to incite them to revolt;

(d) unmasking the hypocrisy of "democracy" in elections, trade unions, labour camps, religion, etc. in the Soviet Union and satellites, and the hypocrisy of Soviet-inspired "Peace propaganda" and its inconsistency with the aggressive Soviet foreign policy supported by the satellites;

(e) correcting misrepresentations about Canada, NATO and the West in general;

(f) reminding listeners living under Communist tyranny that, although we have our social problems we cope with them as do other democratic nations, by bringing about social change without violence; and that the lives of our citizens are not dominated by fear and hate, police, arbitrary law decreed by a "Party elite", official kidnapping, "trials" without benefit of justice, and ubiquitous "security" organs who are a law unto themselves.

In decrying Soviet imperialism and appealing to the national sentiments of the satellites, our policy must also take into account the phenomenon known as Titoism, or national communism freed from the physical and dogmatic control of Moscow. In general we should give cautious encouragement to Titoism guided by the following considerations:

1. That we must never abandon or bargain with our principles, and that we disapprove of totalitarianism and police systems of government based on hate and fear, whether or not they are controlled from Moscow;

2. That we welcome any nation's attempt to shake off the Muscovite shackles which we consider the first step towards possible liberalization; (in referring to Yugoslavia it is possible now to point to a number of recent measures adopted by the Yugoslav Government, which are contributing to a gradual liberalization which we hope will continue);

3. That, while we are absolutely opposed to totalitarian illegality, brutality, immorality, privilege, intellectual enslavement, etc., we recognize the need for social reform in many parts of Eastern and South Eastern Europe and do not support reactionary émigré circles who wish to re-establish the status quo of 1939.

One reason for our cautious approach to Titoism is that, while it has short-term advantages in stemming the spread of Soviet imperialism and in making possible less repugnant regimes than those imposed by the Kremlin, it might in the long run develop in such a way as to present a peculiarly important threat to the Western liberal tradition. That is to say, we cannot rule out the possibility, albeit slight, that some day there might be a number of Titoist regimes in Europe in which the liberalizing process mentioned above was early arrested but which, through their cultivation of nationalism, might be more attractive to the peoples of the free world than is Soviet communism, especially if Tito should succeed in his apparent ambition to transfer the seat of communist orthodoxy and the Lenin tradition to Belgrade.

Memorandum from Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], May 29, 1951

C.B.C.-INTERNATIONAL SERVICE

As you know, I spent a day at the CBC-IS in Montreal on Friday, May 25 with two objects in view. First to see for myself how the implementation of our policy directives is worked out in practice; secondly to have personal talks with Dilworth and his senior officials and to try and get an impression on the spot of the atmosphere and the efficacy of the CBC-IS. This was not, of course, my first visit but the criticism in the House of Commons and elsewhere of the CBC-IS seemed to make this an appropriate moment at which to have another look at the organization.

2. There has certainly been an improvement over the last year in the relationship of this Department with CBC-IS and there has also been an improvement in the machinery for cooperation between us and for the application of policy guidance received from this Department. I may briefly note the methods which have now been adopted to tighten up the implementation of policy and to strengthen cooperation.

(a) CBC-IS has received from this Department a series of policy guidance papers, setting forth in general terms the objectives of our political shortwave broadcasting policy, particularly behind the Iron Curtain.

(b) A liaison officer in the person of Mr. McCordick has been charged with the responsibility of keeping CBC-IS in touch with any developments in policy which would be of interest to them and which they might wish to use either in their broadcasts or as background. An officer in each of the more important political divisions of the Department has been made responsible for informing Mr. McCordick of any developments within their division which might be of interest to CBC-IS. In addition, the senior officials of CBC-IS frequently get in touch directly with me and sometimes with other officials in the Department to discuss problems or obtain information. Most of these communications are by telephone.

(c) An informal committee has been set up under my chairmanship in the Department which meets weekly to discuss problems of Canadian information abroad with particular reference to CBC-IS. The main political divisions and the Information Division are represented on it. Mr. Pidgeon, Policy Coordinator of the CBC-IS, comes up from Montreal to attend these meetings weekly, so that CBC-IS have an opportunity to participate in our discussion of policy matters at the formative stage and to put forward their own views and explore any weaknesses in liaison between us.

(d) The Department furnishes CBC-IS with a certain amount of background material for their broadcasts, papers on special subjects, memoranda and copies of certain despatches from our missions abroad. Physical security arrangements at CBC-IS have somewhat restricted the material which we have been able to make available to them. I understand, however, that CBC-IS are quite willing to accept and put into force any security arrangements which we may think advisable and that Mr. Glazebrook is sending someone down to Montreal to discuss this matter with them.

(e) Our missions abroad in countries to which CBC-IS broadcasts have been asked to make comments and suggestions on their broadcasts and we have had an excellent response from them, including ideas and criticisms. These have been forwarded to CBC-IS.

(f) Within CBC-IS itself, a system of daily policy meetings has been instituted by Mr. Dilworth, with Mr. Pidgeon or himself in the chair. I attended one of these meetings in Montreal. The various section heads responsible for broadcasting to different areas attend these meetings, put up the problems which face them and discuss the policy line. These meetings were instituted by Mr. Dilworth with the idea of instituting a further overall policy control applicable to the different areas.

3. These arrangements are working fairly satisfactorily, given the inevitable difficulties arising from our physical separation from CBC-IS. Mr. Dilworth and his staff have been most cooperative. They have welcomed our suggestions and we have no complaints on this score.

4. After this brief rehearsal of our methods of cooperation with CBC-IS, I may mention some of the principle problems outstanding.

The Application of Policy Directives in Broadcasting

A great deal of criticism has been levelled at the CBC-IS because its tone is not more violently anti-communist. The answer of CBC-IS to this accusation is that, particularly in broadcasting to Czechoslovakia and the U.S.S.R., it is bad practice to swamp their material with diatribes against the communist regime in power. If, for example, you are broadcasting on the shortage of consumer goods in Prague, you would not necessarily wish to insert the fact that the present Czechoslovakian Government is a gang of rogues. Similarly in broadcasting to Italy and France, the CBC-IS does not wish to take a violently partisan attitude in the internal affairs of these countries and to support specific anti-communist groups or individuals as this may be considered as an intervention in the internal affairs of these countries. CBC-IS point out that the BBC follow the same practice as themselves in this respect.

In my conversations with CBC-IS officials on this point, I said that I could quite see the effectiveness of this "objective" point of view as a matter of technique in attracting and holding audiences. On the other hand, I pointed out as forcefully as I could that no one could pretend at this stage in the world struggle to perfect objectivity of intellectual judgement and that even if such objectivity could in theory be obtained, our shortwave broadcasting organization was no place in which to air it. I think this was necessary because there is, I believe, among some people at CBC-IS a slightly "holier than thou" point of view and a misplaced scrupulosity which should be discouraged. It was rather typical of this attitude that one of the section heads charged with broadcasting to Italy remarked to me that it was difficult to impress upon Italian listeners the necessity for "getting out and voting" in the present municipal elections because this was the line being taken by de Gasperi and the Church, hence the adoption of such a slogan by CBC-IS might seem to be an intervention in Italian affairs. I told him that this was carrying "objectivity" too far. We could not be inhibited from emphasizing to the Italians the importance of their anti-communist vote in the eyes of the world by the fact that this comment coincided with the slogans of Italian anti-communists.

Personnel

This brings me to a delicate and somewhat difficult point, namely the difference in approach between some of the CBC-IS personnel and ourselves and thus inevitably to the problem of "foreignness". As you know, the three most important posts in CBC-IS of General Manager, Assistant General Manager and Policy Coordinator are held by born Canadians, whereas most of the area heads are of foreign origin, although I think they are naturalized Canadians. So far as their anti-communist sentiments are concerned, they have been thoroughly checked by the R.C.M.P. so that it does not appear that a question of actual security is involved. On the other hand, some of these men, including Dr. Schmolka, who heads the Czechoslovak section and is acting head of the Russian section, and Mr. Koch, who heads the German and Italian sections, are typical members of the middle European intelligentia, intelligent and hard-working but pretty remote from the average Canadian. To touch on a more delicate subject still, both are Jews. Indeed, I believe that most of the members of the Czech section of CBC-IS are of Jewish origin, as is Miss Jacob, the number two person in the Russian section, Miss Solomon, who now I believe works in the monitoring section, and I should think (although I have no figures) a considerable number of others. This is a little unfortunate, particularly so far as the Czech section is concerned. The Czech section is the most vulnerable part of CBC-Is because of the existence of an active, divided and intransigent Czech colony in Montreal. Members of this colony are, I think, responsible for feeding Kayserlingk with anti-CBC-IS material which Kayserlingk or his friends in turn pass on to critics in the House of Commons. The former Czech Consul in Montreal,

Mr. Kotrly, is a spearhead of this criticism. There are two motives in the minds of the Montreal Czechs in criticizing CBC-IS:

(a) They believe that the Czech service should be much more positive in its denunciations of the present regime (although it is doubtful whether any good purpose would be served by the adoption of this policy).

(b) Many of them would like to have jobs in CBC-IS. It annoys them to see a little group of Czech Jews, many of whom came out of Czechoslovakia before the communist regime had been established, sitting in the Ford Hotel with nice fat jobs and sounding off as the voice of Canada to Czechoslovakia. In particular, they dislike Dr. Schmolka.

It is a pity that the Czech section of the CBC-IS should be so universally disliked by the Czech colony. I suspect, however, that if another set of Czech émigrés were installed in their place, they might also be criticized by the colony. In any case, the broadcasts are not to the Czech colony in Montreal but to Czechoslovakia.

The new Russian section seems to be getting off to a good start. Miss Jacob's experience as personal assistant to the head of the Russian section of the BBC is very valuable. CBC-IS are still looking for a permanent head for this section and are trying to find a hundred per cent Canadian for the job, as they feel that the appointment of virtually anyone of Russian origin is likely to involve them in the same kind of difficulties as they have experienced in the Czech section.

The fundamental difficulty is that in order to run an international broadcasting service, you have to make use of people of foreign origin, both from the point of view of language, knowledge of the culture and habits of the people to whom the broadcasts are being made. Moreover, émigrés who have recently left these countries are more likely to be in touch with postwar conditions than Canadians whose parents or grandparents may be of Czech, German or Russian origin, who might be able to speak the language but are out of touch with current conditions. The BBC and the Voice of America are faced with this same problem. I think it is unavoidable. It will always lend more than a touch of "foreignness" to our International Service. It will always be likely to cause trouble with other recent emigrants from these countries. I do not know how you can get around this problem except by making very sure that such persons apply strictly in their broadcasts the policy directives which they receive from above and that they are closely checked from the security point of view. At the same time, I think that the key positions in the organization should be held by born Canadians and this seems now to be the case in CBC-IS.

This note brings me, I fear, to no firm conclusion. I find it difficult to suggest any further steps which should be taken to improve liaison with CBC-IS or to overcome weaknesses in the organization. Indeed, I think we have made a pretty good start in this direction in the last year or two and it is now a question of ensuring that our machinery for direction and liaison works as well as possible. It will never work perfectly, particularly as long as CBC-IS is in Montreal and we are in Ottawa. Yet, when all is said and done, I do not feel completely happy about CBC-IS. I do not think that we can or should make ourselves responsible for the detailed implementation of policy or for personnel matters (security apart) within the organization. To do this, it would really be necessary to take over the whole of CBC-IS. For example, even to check every word of their broadcasts for possible "deviations" would demand a large staff of trained linguists. No purpose whatsoever would be served by our attaching a liaison officer from External Affairs to the organization unless he had a large measure of authority over policy implementation. This would be a clumsy and inconvenient device which would endanger good relations between us and CBC-IS without being fully effective. If it is felt that, either to disarm public criticism or to attain a more positive implementation of our policies, we should assume responsibility within the organization for policy direction, this, I think, could only be done by supplanting Mr. Dilworth himself with an appointee of our own. This I should hesitate to advise as I think Dilworth is doing a pretty good job and I do not know who we could make available with the required qualifications to take it over from him. Another alternative might be to put a more active General Manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in to succeed Frigon, with special responsibility with regard to CBC-IS. This might be one of our own senior officers or one of our Ambassadors, e.g. Mr. Désy, if he were available. Personally, I am rather attracted by this latter idea as I think it would do CBC-IS no harm and probably some good to be under the continuous supervision in Montreal of a forceful and experienced personality, well-acquainted with the objectives of our foreign policy.

PACIFIC SECURITY PACT; CANADIAN ASSOCIATION

10. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the Minister of External Affairs of Australia had sent a personal message enclosing a draft treaty between the United States, Australia and New Zealand for security in the Pacific. The treaty was similar in outline to the North Atlantic Treaty but had weaker security provisions. It provided that the parties would "consult together" whenever the security of any of them was threatened in the Pacific and each party recognized that an armed attack in the Pacific area on any of the parties "would be dangerous to its own peace and security" and each party "would act to meet the common danger in accordance with its constitutional processes".

Mr. Spender said he would be grateful for Canadian assistance in getting United Kingdom and United States support for the pact. He assumed that Canada, with her wide existing commitments in the Atlantic area, would not wish to be a party to the arrangements.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, undated, Cab. Doc. 59-51)†

11. Mr. Pearson suggested that a reply might be sent assuring the sympathetic interest of Canada in the pact but stating that heavy existing commitments made it difficult for Canada to participate at this time.

12. The Prime Minister was of the opinion that Canada should not become a party to the proposed agreement at present. U.S. association in the agreement was much to be desired.

13. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning discussions between the United States, Australia and New Zealand for a Pacific Security Treaty and agreed that:

(a) Canada should not be associated with the proposed treaty at the present time; and,

(b) a draft reply to the Minister of External Affairs of Australia setting forth the Canadian position be prepared and circulated for consideration.

PACIFIC SECURITY TREATY; REPLY TO THE MINISTER OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS OF AUSTRALIA

22. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of March 1st, 1951, submitted a draft reply[1] to the communication from the Minister of External Affairs of Australia concerning the proposed Pacific security treaty.

23. The Minister of Fisheries was of the opinion that the proposed reply was too negative.

25. The Cabinet agreed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Fisheries consult concerning the reply to be sent to the communication from the Minister of External Affairs of Australia concerning the proposed Pacific security treaty and submit a revised draft for consideration.

PACIFIC SECURITY TREATY; REPLY TO THE MINISTER FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS OF AUSTRALIA

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the discussion at the meeting of March 2nd, 1951, said that as the Minister for External Affairs of Australia (Mr. Spender) would shortly be resigning to take up his appointment as Ambassador to the United States, it had been thought that it might not be necessary to reply to his message of February 23rd regarding the proposed Pacific security treaty. It had now been learned, however, that the arrangements embodied in the draft treaty represented the policy of the Australian government as a whole.

He read a revised draft reply to Mr. Spender that had been prepared in consultation with the Minister of Fisheries. This, while making it clear that Canada was not intending to participate in the proposed arrangements, expressed sympathetic interest and linked Canadian participation in North Atlantic defence to the proposed Pacific security treaty as important contributions to the defence of the free world in general.

The Canadian Ambassador in Washington had discussed the draft treaty with Mr. Dulles, who had indicated that it was satisfactory to the United States authorities provided the Republic of the Philippines were a party. Mr. Dulles had not raised any question of Canadian participation.

2. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding recent developments in connection with the proposed Pacific security treaty, and approved the general lines of the reply on this matter that he planned to send to the Minister for External Affairs of Australia.

TELEGRAM EX-597 Ottawa, March 22, 1951

PACIFIC SECURITY ARRANGEMENTS

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: Your WA-1043 of March 20.†

1. A personal message was sent by Mr. Pearson to Mr. Spender on March 15.† A copy has been sent to you under Letter No. Y-1231 of March 19.† The letter assures Mr. Spender of the sympathetic interest of the Canadian Government in the negotiations, confirms Mr. Spender's assumption that Canada's heavy commitments in the North Atlantic area would for the time being limit our participation in security arrangements in the Pacific, and notes our belief that the proposed tripartite pact would be an important contribution to the defence of the free world. The letter further states that the Canadian Government will "take advantage of any suitable occasion which may arise to express to the United Kingdom and the United States Governments our agreement with the objectives of such security arrangements" as the tripartite pact.

2. The matter was considered by Cabinet at several meetings and the text of the letter approved. Cabinet agreed that Canada should not be associated with the treaty at the present time. Because of our concern lest the project may have been one sponsored by Mr. Spender himself rather than by the Australian Government, we requested our High Commissioner to make enquiries in Canberra. You will have received a copy of Canberra's telegram No. 24 of March 9,† which informed us that this proposal was Australian Government policy.

3. We must be cautious in expressing our attitude towards the security treaty, for although we would not wish to participate in it, neither would we wish to give Australia and New Zealand the impression that we are indifferent to their natural desires to secure more direct entry to allied planning. We do not think it is our task to "reassure" London or "encourage" Washington. While we see no obvious reason for opposing the present security arrangement, its possible extension would be another problem. On a number of occasions the Canadian view that a widely based "Pacific Pact" would be premature has been expressed.

4. Since you will have received copies of the telegrams from London setting out the United Kingdom views on Pacific security arrangements, there is no need to dwell on these arguments. We think it especially important, however, that although the United Kingdom Government has approved the idea of the tripartite pact, it will wish to reconsider its position if the United States should feel obliged to propose the inclusion of the Philippines. We would be grateful for your further comments as to why the United States would wish to include the Philippines in such a pact when the present security commitments which the United States has assumed with regard to the Philippines could scarcely be more substantial.

5. The problem of Japanese participation does not seem to us to be of immediate importance since Mr. Dulles expressed the opinion in Tokyo that the Japanese were not yet ready to play a part in any Pacific organization. He thought it would be best to have another look at this question in two or three years' time. We doubt that the Australian Government would find it politically possible to agree to the admission of Japan at the present time when that Government will put the tripartite pact before the electorate as a guarantee against the dangers of the possible renewal of Japanese military aggression in the area.

6. It would be invidious for Canada to urge the United States to accept new treaty obligations unless Canada is willing to join the treaty. We are of the opinion therefore that you should go no further in your conversations with State Department officials than to express our general agreement with the objectives of the proposal. You can make it clear that we do not think Canada can assume further commitments in the Pacific. You might also express our general concern over the dilemma posed by a Pacific pact. To be a Pacific pact it should include certain Asian states whom it may be difficult to accept. If these states are ignored, what is left is an organization which might be an affront to even friendly Asian nationalists. Even the tripartite pact raises these difficulties. In spite of the fact, however, that the press has and will continue to term the proposed arrangements as a "Pacific Pact", that is in our view a misnomer and the proposal is not open to the same objections as earlier proposals for a widely based pact were. We are of the opinion that the best case can be made for bilateral United States-Australia and United States-New Zealand arrangements. If the present negotiations were to result into such bilateral arrangements, some of the difficulties raised by the inclusion or omission of certain countries might be avoided.[2]

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL Paris, November 7, 1951

The Australian Secretary of State for External Affairs called to see me this morning, and we had a useful talk for 3/4 of an hour. Casey is obviously going to do the job — at least at international conferences — in a very different way from his predecessors, and I think he will be more successful in making friends and influencing people; even though his old Etonian, striped-pants manner may put off some of the rougher exponents of the new diplomacy.

He told me that he had a plan in the back of his mind in which he thought we would be interested, namely, the extension of the present three separate security pacts to cover other countries of Southeast Asia. He said that his ideas in this regard had been reinforced by the trip he had just had through that part of the world. He was concerned not so much with the security of Australia itself, which was not likely to be increased by any new proposals, as with the desirability of building up a collective system in the Pacific and Southeast Asia through which the free Asian countries could work together. He said that he was shocked by the lack of contact between them and the lack of knowledge that they had of each other's problems. He had particularly in mind, Thailand, Indo-China and Indonesia, the three countries which, I gather, he thought might be charter members of his new security club. He agreed that India and Burma were not likely to be interested, but talks he had in Karachi encouraged him to think that once Kashmir difficulties had been cleared away, Pakistan would be a very valuable connecting link in the chain of collective security which would soon, he hoped, extend around the globe. He had received hopeful assurances in that regard from Nazimuddim, but agreed with me when I suggested that such assurances might be inspired in large part by a desire to secure Australian support for the Pakistan cause in Kashmir.

I told Casey that we were, of course, interested in Pacific security, and that there had been a good deal of discussion about it recently in the House of Commons. I pointed out to him, however, that our commitments were pretty extensive under North Atlantic arrangements, and gave him some figures in this regard that surprised him. However, I assured him that we would not be disinterested in the building up of a strong and cohesive Pacific security arrangement. Casey, of course, realized that the key to the whole situation was Washington. Indeed, one of the reasons why he favoured some such development as that indicated above was that

[2] Pour la suite des événements, voir le document 950.
For subsequent developments see Document 950.

Washington now was helping the various countries concerned individually, without co-ordinating that assistance. He thought that the Americans would surely appreciate the value of such co-ordination. He admitted, however, that he had not broached this question to them as yet, but intended to explore it with Acheson within the next few days.

All this makes it, I think, a matter of some importance that we should secure from Washington, as I suggested before leaving Ottawa, an indication of their views on the extension, say, of the Tripartite Pacific Pact to include, first, Canada, and possibly other countries.

Casey also indicated to me some of the anxieties they had in Australia regarding North Atlantic developments, because of their exclusion from such developments and the effect they might have on the Commonwealth association. He had already expressed these anxieties to me in a letter,† copy of which you will have. I think I succeeded in removing most of them and told him that we would keep his Government very closely informed of developments in the North Atlantic field. He was grateful for this promise, all the more because Australia would probably be involved in these developments, at least so far as military planning is concerned, by their proposed association with the Middle East Command. On this latter point, he confirmed what I had heard previously, that the Australians were worried about this Middle Eastern planning because they would be expected to make contributions to it but were not at all convinced that they would be given an adequate share in the political planning which would determine to a very large extent the military arrangements. In this regard, also, he said that they would have some difficulty in Australia in making prior commitments for sending specified military forces to the Middle East. This difficulty, he understood, did not apply to New Zealand and South Africa where the essential political decisions to make such commitments had already been taken. However, he thought that the Australian Government would soon follow the same line, but not without adequate assurances that they would be given a share in control.

Casey also brought up the question of Australia's desire to be elected to the Economic and Social Council. I told him that this might be difficult at the present Assembly as India had a strong claim to re-election. However, I admitted that a case could be made for both Australian and Indian membership and that I would review our own policy in regard to this matter. I told him, however, that if Australia would wait for a year that she would have no difficulty, I thought, in securing Canada's seat, which we would be glad to yield to her gracefully and, indeed, even thankfully.

Finally, Casey asked me what I thought of their High Commissioner in Ottawa, and I told him that Mr. Forde had won all our affections. He knew what I meant, and said that they were not going to disturb him for six or seven months, but at the end of that time he would be glad to return to Australia. He would then be replaced by a very prominent Australian whose name Casey told me in confidence, and who will, I think, make a very able High Commissioner in Ottawa. Casey also told me about some of the steps they were taking to strengthen their Foreign Service which, he felt, had not achieved a very high level under the Evatt-Burton regime. Regarding the latter gentleman, he had nothing to say that was good and much to say that was bad.

SECURITY IN THE PACIFIC

1. I have read with interest the memorandum from Mr. Pearson recording his discussion with the Australian Minister for External Affairs in Paris on November 7th. The reference on page 2 of this memorandum to Mr. Pearson's suggestion that we sound out the Department of State on the possibility of extending the tripartite Pacific agreement to include Canada and perhaps other countries arises from a telephone conversation between Mr. Pearson and myself just before he left Ottawa for Paris. Mr. Pearson referred to the numerous references to security in the Pacific in the debate on international affairs in the House of Commons on October 22nd and 23rd, and he asked me to sound out the State Department informally and without in any way indicating a direct interest on the part of the Canadian Government.

2. I first asked Mr. Ignatieff to mention the matter casually at one of the weekly meetings which he holds with Mr. Raynor or Mr. Haselton of the State Department simply by drawing attention to the observations on this subject made in the House of Commons and expressing interest in any views that might be held in the State Department. I believe that I wrote a personal letter to Mr. Pearson passing on the not very informative result of this approach, but — and this, of course, is without precedent — I have been unable to find a copy of this letter on our files. I am therefore enclosing a copy of the note given to me by Mr. Ignatieff of this conversation, which took place on November 7th.

3. On November 16th Mr. Dean Rusk lunched with me and in the course of a general conversation on Far Eastern affairs asked for my personal opinion on the prospects of strengthening international security arrangements in the Pacific. My second enclosure is a copy of a letter which I addressed to Mr. Pearson in Paris on the following day. I might add to what is said in it that Mr. Rusk also remarked that a real difficulty encountered in negotiating a security agreement to include the Asiatic countries which should logically be members, was that some of them were unwilling to participate with others in a multilateral agreement and preferred to make special arrangements of their own with the United States if possible. He also mentioned that the question of the inclusion in any general security agreement of the United Kingdom, France and possibly the Netherlands (so long as control is maintained over Netherlands New Guinea) would have to be taken into account. He did not mention the position of the Nationalist Government in Formosa, but I should imagine that so long as the present situation endures that Government would make strong efforts to be included, which might be embarrassing for the United States to refuse.

4. Mr. Casey will be in Washington from December 7th to 12th, and he may then seek to pursue the matter. We shall seek to find out from the Australian Embassy after his departure the nature of any discussion he may have on this subject.

PACIFIC PACT

At my last meeting with Raynor I had drawn his attention informally to the references in the recent debate on foreign affairs in the House of Commons in Ottawa, concerning the Pacific pact and left a copy of Hansard. Raynor asked Haselton to follow this up. The information given to me yesterday by Haselton was not very conclusive but was possibly the best that could be obtained at a low level in the State Department. Haselton, who was reading from a memorandum apparently prepared by a junior officer in the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, recalled that the bilateral agreements which the U.S. had concluded with Australia, New Zealand and the Philippines had not been initiated by the United States. They had been initiated by the other parties and had been accepted by the United States as a price which had to be paid for an agreement with these countries on the Japanese Peace Treaty. It had been made clear at that time that Australia, New Zealand and the Philippines were not prepared to enter any multilateral pact which would include Japan. At that time also the United Kingdom had opposed combining the Philippines, Australia and New Zealand in one security pact. As to the possibility of now broadening the series of bilateral agreements into a security pact for the Pacific as a whole, Haselton noted that the texts of the bilateral agreements envisaged the possibility of such a broadening. The pact with Australia, for instance, included language to the effect that this agreement would continue in effect "pending the development of a broader security pact in the Pacific". So far as he knew, however, the State Department does not expect to take any initiative in the immediate future to broaden the scope of these agreements. The next step which has to be taken is to secure the ratification of these agreements as soon as Congress meets. The State Department are not aware of any move by any other country towards the negotiation of a broader security pact in the Pacific. The State Department would be interested to receive any indication that any country is interested in this subject. The State Department would see considerable difficulties which would have to be overcome in defining the area and the membership of such an organization. He thought that it would be taken for granted that Canada would be a member but there would be difficulties in deciding who should be the members on the other side of the Pacific. Not only self-governing countries are involved, such as Indonesia, but also the metropolitan countries, such as the United Kingdom and France, with dependent areas, such as Malaya and Indo-China, under their control. Haselton concluded his remarks by saying that on the "working level" no active consideration was being given in the State Department to extending the bilateral security agreement to a broader multilateral pact, but it was possible that at the top level some thought had been given to this problem. He asked whether I would like to have a memorandum indicating our interest brought to the attention of Mr. Foster Dulles or Mr. Rusk. I said I thought this was not necessary and might be misunderstood. I stressed again that this was an informal enquiry initiated by the Embassy in view of the interest shown in the possibility of a Pacific pact by several members of the House of Commons in Ottawa, and did not represent in any way an initiative by the Canadian Government. I do not know whether you would consider that there is sufficient in this conversation to provide a basis for a letter to the Under-Secretary.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Washington, November 17, 1951

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

We have already given you some answer to the suggestion which you made to me just before you left Ottawa that I should sound out opinion in the State Department on the question of Canadian adhesion to the tripartite Pacific treaty with Australia and New Zealand. Dean Rusk lunched with me yesterday, and he gave me a neat opening by asking me what I thought of the prospects of a general Pacific security pact. I answered that they seemed to me to be pretty remote, and he agreed that he could not see any solid foundation for a multilateral treaty which might be roughly analogous to the North Atlantic Treaty.

I then remarked that considerable interest in this subject had been displayed in last month's debate in the House of Commons, and not only by some members from the Pacific Coast. I had been surprised by this and would like to know what would be the attitude of the State Department towards the adhesion of Canada to the tripartite treaty. I allowed him to infer that I was raising the matter out of personal curiosity. He answered immediately that he thought from the point of view of the State Department there would be no difficulty at all, but went on to say that he would expect opposition from the United Kingdom, since the Labour Government had not seemed to be at all happy about a separate agreement between the U.S., Australia and New Zealand. I let the matter rest there.

Yours sincerely,

TELEGRAM WA-139 Washington, January 11, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Your EX-26 dated 5th January.[3] Trade with China and North Korea.

1. This subject was discussed with Robert Barnett, Officer in Charge, economic section of the office of Chinese Affairs in the State Department. His remarks, in summary, were as follows:

(a) Export control

Licences are required for all shipments to Communist China, Hong Kong and Macao. The prevention of all exports to China is not a declared United States Government policy, but this, in effect, is being achieved by the denial of licences for any exports to China and by the order that United States vessels can not carry cargo to Communist China.

The export of a small quantity of non-strategic materials to Hong Kong and Macao is being permitted. Hong Kong's difficulties may make it necessary to enlarge the flow of goods to the colony but United States public opinion makes this very difficult.

(b) Imports

The freezing of Chinese assets and the blocking of outgoing payments is calculated to prevent direct imports from China. It is the intention of the United States Government to put an end to all normal import trade. Foreign exchange for imports from China will only be permitted where the imports are considered to be in the national interest, i.e. strategic material. It is also planned to attempt to prevent indirect imports from China, i.e. by goods in transit from other countries.

[3] Voir/See Volume 16, Document 1038.

Barnett admitted the ineffectualness of unilateral economic sanctions of this kind but seemed to think that the government's hand was forced by the pressure of public opinion. Barnett was informed about our concern over the United States action, as outlined in teletype EX-26 of January 5th.

2. The remainder of this message is concerned with the execution of the policy of the United States Government with respect to imports into the United States of goods originating from China and North Korea. It is expected that additional comment will be forwarded shortly after discussions with Department of Commerce representatives to obtain their views about the probable impact of the import restrictions on current trade.

3. The object of the present United States policy is to prevent the acquisition of United States dollars by China and North Korea. The measures in force are financial in nature and are in the process of being correlated with customs procedures to ensure their effectiveness. The regulations issued by the Treasury Department permit the entry of commodities originating from China and North Korea into the United States, provided that payment for such imports is made into a blocked account. The government does not make any assurance with respect to future disposition.

4. The action taken by the Secretary of the Treasury is based on section 5 (B) of the Trading with the Enemy Act, under authority delegated by the President by executive order No. 9193. This legal position was considered to be adequate for independent action by Secretary Snyder but the adoption of the current policy took place after full discussion by the National Security Council and it is considered that any departure from the present policy position will require re-consideration at this level.

5. This question was referred to the National Security Council as it would consider the wider defence and political aspects in addition to the international financial aspects which alone might have been considered if the matter had been referred to the National Advisory Council. Treasury Department representatives have requested that this information about internal procedures be kept confidential.

6. Treasury Department regulations governing the financial control aspects of trade with China and North Korea were issued under title 31, chapter V of the United States Code (forwarded to the Department by despatch No. 66 dated January 5th).† Specific references of interest are sections 201 of subpart B and 533 and 534 of subpart E. The work of linking these regulations with a customs procedure designed to ensure the compliance of United States importers is in progress and it is expected that instructions to customs authorities will be issued within two weeks.

7. The plan being worked out contemplates using the existing customs definition for determining the country of origin. If this results in specifying China or North Korea as the country of origin, the goods will be impounded until proof is presented to customs that payment in United States dollars has been made into a blocked account. Precise procedural methods are being developed to prevent practices "which would make a mockery of existing regulations which have the status of law".

3. Treasury Department representatives hold the opinion that the regulations in force, buttressed by customs procedures now being developed, will bring import trade from China and North Korea to a virtual standstill. The method employed is expected to produce results closely approaching an embargo although embargo techniques are not being employed. Paragraph 4 of teletype message WA-3414, dated the 29th of December, 1950 should therefore be modified accordingly.[4]

9. The question of familiarizing United States importers with the ramifications of these trade restraints is being taken up with the "National Council of American Importers" which is considered to be the best medium for providing additional trade publicity. Discussions with this organization have included the subject of trans-shipments. Subject to the customs rules with respect to country of origin, the same requirement for payment into a blocked account will be necessary regardless of the number of trans-shipment points.

10. It was emphasized that evasive procedures such as barter, deferred payment, and payment from funds lodged outside the United States will not qualify the goods for release and that transfer of title outside the United States will not be acknowledged unless it occurred before December 17th, 1950, the effective date of the financial controls.

11. One apparent weakness in the existing regulations is that the value which must be paid into a blocked account is the value billed by the Chinese exporter. If the exporter wishes to give the goods away, the financial controls of themselves would not offer a bar. This might mean that an evasive payment could be made by the United States importer from funds lodged abroad. When asked about this feature, Arnold of the Treasury Department said that a watch would be kept for illegal transactions of this nature and evidence of below-value shipments would be carefully investigated.

12. There are many transactional features about goods coming within the scope of these regulations which will not be clear until working arrangements with the customs bureau have been effected and it may be preferable to delay consideration of notifying Canadian traders about the United States regulations related to trans-shipments until that time.

13. The Canadian policy with respect to imports into Canada from China and North Korea for consumption or trans-shipment to points other than the United States has not been considered as being within the scope of the discussions with the Treasury Department, despite the general comment reported in paragraph 2 of WA-3414, dated the 29th of December. Treasury Department interest is centred in the question of re-exports from Canada, and Willis of the Treasury Department has been informed that we do not appear to have any legal authority for import controls at present that could be used to prevent goods being imported into Canada from China and North Korea for re-export to the United States.

RE EXPORTS TO CHINA, KOREA, HONG KONG AND MACAO

1. Canadian and United States officials concerned with export controls met yesterday and today. In order that all interested officials of both governments might be informed of Canadian and American policies a short confidential statement was agreed upon. This would be used as a guide to answering questions which members of the public might ask. The statement follows at the end of this message.

2. In addition, it was emphasized by Canadian officials that in so far as Canadian export restrictions might be less rigorous than United States export restrictions Canadian firms would not be allowed to take advantage of the situation. Only normal exports from Canada would be allowed; thus, Canada would not deliberately frustrate United States policy.

3. The statement referred to in paragraph 1 is as follows:

Text begins:

CONFIDENTIAL January 19, 1951

EXPORTS TO CHINA, KOREA, HONG KONG AND MACAO; POLICIES OF UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN GOVERNMENTS

1. Exports to Korea. Policies are identical. Neither Government allows any exports except to United Nations armed forces.

2. Exports to Hong Kong and Macao of goods that are not considered liable to be re-exported to China or Korea, or other Communist areas. A new United States policy is in process of adoption. When adopted, policies of the two governments will be virtually identical. Both would allow limited shipments of both strategic and non-strategic goods for use in Hong Kong (and Macao) or for transhipment to destinations other than China, Korea, or other Communist areas.

3. Exports to China direct or through Hong Kong or Macao. There is an apparent divergence of policy. The Canadian Government would permit exports of goods that were neither strategic nor in short supply. The United States Government would not. The apparent divergence does not produce any significant divergence in practical results. The Chinese Communist Government will not permit the import of goods for ordinary civilian consumption; it permits only essential raw materials, capital equipment and other strategic items. These latter classes of imports are virtually identical with the classes of goods considered either strategic or in short supply by both U.S.A. and Canada. Under present conditions neither government would permit these goods to move.

Note: The above confidential statement was drawn up at a meeting of United States and Canadian officials concerned with export controls on January 19th, 1951. Text ends.

CANADIAN TRADE WITH CHINA

On March 7th the United States Department of the Treasury issued a regulation directing Collectors of Customs to prohibit the landing in the United States of merchandise of Chinese or North Korean origin intended for consumption, for immediate exportation, or for transportation and exportation. There are a few other purposes to which the prohibition applies, but they are not of immediate concern to us. Landing of this merchandise is only permitted if an import license is granted, and application must be made to the Federal Reserve Bank in New York. The regulation applies to goods moving to Canada in transit through the United States, which are of Chinese or North Korean origin.

2. These import controls were imposed by the United States to reduce the opportunities, among other objectives, of Communist China obtaining United States currency. United States citizens are, in the great majority of cases, denied import licenses as the Treasury Department has decided that, to obtain the desired results, significant exceptions can not be allowed.

3. The effects of this policy were soon felt in Canada and the Embassy in Washington was asked to approach Treasury officials to see what procedure could be developed for the release of goods of Chinese origin purchased in China or Hong Kong and shipped in bond from United States ports.

4. The first reaction of the Treasury officials was not unfavourable to Canadian interests. They believed that the Foreign Assets Control Division would probably give immediate assent to any Canadian application for an import license when it was supported by the Department of Trade and Commerce. They expected that these licenses would relate for the most part to Canadian strategic procurement i.e. purchases on behalf of the Canadian Commercial Corporation or the Canadian

[5] Notes marginales :/Marginal notes:

Armed Forces direct. They also recognized the possibility of small Canadian importers, working for their own account and not on behalf of a Government agency, finding themselves pinched by the regulation, and said that as long as the amount involved was not too large and the bona fides of the firm was attested to by the Canadian authorities, licenses could probably be arranged for them. It was understood, however, that the Canadian authorities would direct the attention of Canadian importers and banks to the Treasury regulation and that there should be in due course a gradual decrease in and eventual end to, hardship cases. Throughout the conversations it was stressed that the United States authorities had no intention of allowing the use of United States port facilities to any Canadian importers who were attempting to circumvent the regulation by doing important business with China when these facilities were being denied to United States importers.

5. It was ascertained that the Treasury Department had not made a specific study of the regulation in the light of existing international treaties or international commercial law. The regulation was brought into effect by administrative action alone. Interference with in transit goods not the property of United States nationals would appear to infringe on the sovereignty of Canadian buyers' commercial rights and contravene Article V of Part I of GATT (Freedom of Transit). Our Commercial Counsellor in Washington has expressed the opinion, however, that it does not seem unreasonable, from the United States point of view, to decline, after reasonable warning and a preparatory period, to accord its port facilities to foreigners for trade which it does not permit to its own nationals.

6. The Acting Director of the Foreign Assets Control Division has since let our Embassy know that:

(1) new applications for import licenses covering goods of Chinese origin will be dealt with in the strictest possible way. It is considered that importers should be well aware by now of the FAC regulation, and shipments after March 15th from Hong Kong or China will be regarded with suspicion.

(2) FAC would be inclined generally, when letters of credit or drafts have been executed, to protect the bank and pass the onus on to the importer.

(3) FAC might require that the goods be returned to their point of origin, and from there, the goods still being in his name, the importer might make arrangements for direct shipment to Canada by other than United States flag vessels.

(4) FAC would not consent to the carriage from United States West coast ports to Vancouver or other Canadian ports of goods originating in China or North Korea by vessels not of United States flag.

7. Mr. Bull believes that we should not press too hard for concessions in favour of Canadian importers when their counterparts in the United States are subject to the full impact of the regulation. He considers that we can not be too critical of the stand taken by the United States regarding trade with China and that it is doubtful if the United States could be persuaded to waive the regulation in favour of Canadian importers. Mr. Bull expresses the view that if the United States intends to impose the equivalent of sanctions on China, that would appear to be its business.

8. The Department of Trade and Commerce considers that it would be a reasonable compromise, if FAC would licence shipments consigned to Canada paid for prior to March 15th, and that provision also be made for the importation of commodities that are licensed for consumption in the United States, such as bristles, and perhaps feathers.

9. Canada has no import restrictions on trade with China and if importers can arrange for shipping facilities direct to Canada in other than United States flag ships, they would be subject only to a possible increase in landing costs.

10. As a matter of interest in 1950 imports from China and Hong Kong amounted to $7,500,000 and exports, to $10,000,000. Mr. Bryan in New York is now trying to find out from the Federal Reserve Bank how many applications for import licenses have been submitted by Canadian firms.

11. I am inclined to agree with Bull's views. Do you agree?[6]

RÉPUBLIQUE DE CHINE : QUESTION DE RECONNAISSANCE REPUBLIC OF CHINA: QUESTION OF RECOGNITION

949. DEA/50055-B-40

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], June 9, 1951

The following is a reconsideration of the advantages and disadvantages of the withdrawal of recognition from the Nationalist Government of China prepared after seeing the personal and confidential letter of May 30† which Mr. Wrong sent to you to record a conversation he had had with Messrs. Walter Lippmann and Herbert Elliston.

2. Continued recognition of the Chinese Nationalist Government by a majority of the Western powers undoubtedly serves as an irritant to the Central People's Government and contributes to its suspicion that the long-run objective of those powers is to reinstate Chiang Kai-shek in China. This suspicion can only have been reinforced by MacArthur's statements about transforming the Pacific into a peaceful (i.e., American) lake and the stepping-up of United States assistance to the Nationalist Government.

3. The combination of continued recognition and the physical location of Nationalist forces on Formosa is particularly explosive with its implication from the Chinese point of view of intervention in the Chinese civil war. Withdrawal of recognition from the Nationalist Government might serve to allay Peking's suspicions on this point to a certain degree, especially if it were accompanied by some expression of intention on the part of the United States not to maintain a hold on Formosa in perpetuity, an expression which could also carry the implication that the way was being cleared for recognition of the Central People's Government and for the representation of that government in the United Nations.

[6] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Mr Reid I think Bull's attitude the right one May 22 A.D.P.H[eeney].

4. To have substantial practical effect, withdrawal of recognition by Canada from the Chinese Nationalist Government should be accompanied or followed by similar action on the part of other western governments. The maximum effect, of course, would only accrue if such action were also taken by the United States. In their discussion at dinner Messrs. Lippmann and Elliston appeared to think that withdrawal of recognition by Canada might serve a useful purpose by encouraging moderate opinion in the United States to support similar action by their government. It is to be noted, however, that this suggestion was qualified by the consideration that recognition should not be withdrawn immediately but only when there seemed to be a real prospect of a Korean settlement. It would also be advisable to take such a step only after consultation with the United States government. Mr. Wrong has not recently consulted that government but could easily do so informally.

5. The basis of Walter Lippmann's editorial which was enclosed with Mr. Wrong's letter was that peace in the Far East is indivisible, that it is not possible to seek peace with China in Korea while waging war against China elsewhere. The withdrawal of recognition from the Nationalist Government, if this thesis is accepted, therefore would have significance in Chinese eyes only if there was the implication that the United States would be willing to see Formosa reunited with the mainland of China in the near future. The Central People's Government would not be inclined to accept an arrangement in which the United States "neutralized" Formosa, even if that neutralization extended beyond the present military neutralization (which is not in fact very effective as a restraint on the Nationalists) to include political neutralization by withdrawal of recognition from Chiang Kai-shek. Neutralization of Formosa, no matter how complete, implies aggression in Chinese eyes if it is done by the United States alone. While, therefore, withdrawal of recognition from the Nationalist Government by the United States is desirable, it is useful only if it indicates a willingness to treat with the Central People's Government on a basis of equality and not from a pedestal of moral superiority.

6. The same argument applies to the proposal to accompany withdrawal of recognition from the Nationalist Government by support for further sanctions against China. If it is accepted that peace in the Far East is indivisible and that it is impossible to wage war on China in one field while trying to make peace with it in another, then it would be unwise to make a bargain of this nature, especially as the end result might well be to leave us in the position of lending our support to United States suggestions for additional sanctions while failing to secure United States support for withdrawal of recognition from the Nationalist Government.

7. If recognition were withdrawn from the Nationalist Government of China, we should not have to alter our current policy in voting on the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations. Our current practice is as follows:

(a) In organizations which are competent to take decisions on the matter

(i) we support motions for postponement provided that no specific time limit is fixed; or

(ii) if the substantive question is voted on, we abstain.

(b) In subsidiary bodies of United Nations organs and of the Specialized Agencies we support motions of non-competence or, if necessary, oppose motions designed to alter the present representation of China in such bodies.

8. The legal considerations in connection with the withdrawal of recognition from the Nationalist Government without simultaneous recognition of the Central People's Government are attached as appendix "A".

A.D.P. H[EENEY]

[APPENDICE A/APPENDIX A]

Legal Considerations

1. Having met the objective conditions prescribed by international law; effective control of the national territory, obedience of the bulk of the population and a reasonable prospect of permanency; the Chinese Communist Government has qualified for recognition as the de jure government of China. Conversely the Chinese Nationalist Government is not, according to international law, entitled to continued recognition as the Government of China.

2. Withdrawal of recognition of a government may be expressly communicated but it is usually implied in the recognition of a new authority. Instances are very rare where withdrawal of recognition from one authority has not been accompanied by the recognition of a new authority as the government of the state concerned. The only definite case on record appears to be the United States Government's withdrawal of recognition of the Government of Nicaragua in 1856, without recognizing a new authority. The reason given was that it was not clear which authority was actually in control. In 1942 Canada (but not the United Kingdom or the United States) withdrew recognition of the Vichy Government without at the same time extending recognition to any other authority in France. This is not a useful precedent, however, since all of France was, to all intents and purposes under the de facto control of Germany.

3. It would be paradoxical not to recognize a government of China while continuing to recognize the existence of the Chinese state, since a condition of the recognition of a state is that it possess an independent government. Furthermore, the withdrawal of recognition of the Nationalist Government combined with continued non-recognition of the Communist Government would have the effect of depriving the Chinese state to a substantial extent, vis-à-vis Canada, of its status under international law. In view, however, of the very limited nature of relations between China and Canada this would have very little practical effect.

4. Withdrawal of de jure recognition of the Nationalist Government without recognizing the Peking Government in substitution would create a situation wherein in fact the Peking Government would control the Chinese mainland and the Nationalist Government, Formosa. The question of de facto recognition of these governments as opposed to de jure recognition, need not, it is suggested, be the subject of any announcement or political decision at this time. It is unlikely, but nevertheless possible, that the situation could arise where Canadian courts would seek a statement from the Government as to which of the Chinese governments is the de facto government in a particular area. If such an event arose, it is submitted that the certificate should be given in accordance with the facts.

5. Withdrawal of recognition of the Nationalist Government gives rise to several other considerations:

(a) Chinese indebtedness to Canada amounts to approximately $50,000,000, $35,000,000 of which represents the value of military equipment supplied to the Nationalist Government. It is doubtful whether the Nationalist Government would liquidate this debt even if recognition were not withdrawn;

(b) A loan of $13,000,000 by Canadian banks to the Ming Sung Company of China is guaranteed jointly by the Canadian and Chinese Nationalist Governments. Withdrawal of recognition of the Nationalist Government would leave the Canadian Government the sole guarantor of this debt;

(c) The Canadian Government would have to assume responsibility for safeguarding Chinese property in Canada which, according to information available, consists of real estate in Vancouver and Ottawa.

6. In view of the fact that recognition is popularly misconceived as connoting approval, it might be desirable to emphasize that the withdrawal of recognition of the Nationalist Government, if it should be decided upon, is not based upon disapproval of that Government but upon the fact that it no longer governs China. Withdrawal of recognition of the Nationalist Government will not, in the absence of an intention to do so, imply recognition of the Communist Government.[7]

DESPATCH 1026 Washington, March 27, 1951

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY

1. When I saw Mr. Dulles on March 14th he told me that he expected shortly to be able to give to the representatives of governments which are members of the Far Eastern Commission and to the representatives of Indonesia, Ceylon, and Korea the text of a suggested draft of a Japanese Peace Treaty, together with an explanatory memorandum. Mr. Dulles asked me to see him this morning in order to receive these documents. These I enclose, in duplicate.[8] I have not yet had time to study them carefully. As it is desirable to forward them by today's diplomatic bag, this despatch is confined to a report of my conversation with Mr. Dulles.

2. In handing me the text of the draft Treaty, he drew attention particularly to the footnote at the end of Chapter 4 dealing with security in order to emphasize that it was contemplated that the provisions of the Treaty must be supplemented by a bilateral agreement between the United States and Japan and also by wider security arrangements among certain Pacific states. He repeated that any bilateral arrangements which would permit the stationing of United States forces in Japan after the inclusion of the Treaty would be of an interim character only until Japan could provide the ground forces necessary for home defence.

3. He also drew attention to a brief footnote which appears towards the bottom of page 6 dealing with reparations, explaining that this was inserted mainly because of the strong objections taken by the Philippine Government to any renunciation of reparation claims.

[8] Voir/See United States, Department of State, Foreign Relations of the United States, (FRUS), 1951, Volume VI, Washington, D.C.: United States Government Printing Office, 1977, pp. 944-950.

4. As to procedure, he said that he had already handed these documents to the Embassies of the United Kingdom, Australia, and New Zealand, and would give them this week to the representatives in Washington of the other countries named in the first paragraph of the covering memorandum. The Soviet Embassy would be the last to receive them, and as the Soviet Government now took the position that it refused to discuss the Japanese Peace Treaty with the United States the documents would merely be delivered by note to the Soviet Ambassador. He hopes that the recipient governments will all make known their views in writing within three or four weeks so that the draft may be reviewed in the light of the comments received. I told Mr. Dulles that I thought it likely that the Canadian Government would be able to comment on the draft within the period which he mentioned.

5. Mr. Dulles went on to say that so far as he could judge the points of difficulty were not numerous. There were the objection of the Philippines over the surrender of reparation claims, an objection made fairly strongly by the United Kingdom with support from Australia and New Zealand over the absence in the draft of any admission of war guilt, and the desire of the United Kingdom to bring about through the Treaty a reduction in Japanese ship-building capacity. These were the main differences which had been brought to his attention, except for the comprehensive objections of the Soviet Union.

6. I asked Mr. Dulles whether any effort was being made to bring about the conclusion of some security arrangements in the Pacific in advance of the conclusion of the Japanese Treaty, mentioning in particular the part which these issues were playing in the Australian general election. He said that he had not been approached recently by the Australian Government, although he understood that that government was applying some pressure on the United Kingdom to secure strong support for arrangements on the lines discussed during his recent visit to Canberra. He added that there was no possibility that anything could be settled before the Australian elections, saying that the matter had not yet been considered by the President and the Joint Chiefs of Staff as he wished to be able to present to them more concrete proposals than was now possible. The outline of what he now has in mind does not differ from that given in my WA-947 of March 14th† reporting my earlier talk with him on this subject. While the inclusion of the Philippine Government in any arrangements cannot be regarded as firm, he feels strongly that they should be included in order to avoid any suggestion of a colour bar as well as for other reasons. At present he contemplates that whatever may come out of these discussions should be signed at the same time as the Japanese Treaty.

7. I took this opportunity of informing Mr. Dulles, as authorized by your message EX-597 of March 22nd,[9] that the Canadian Government agreed with the general objectives of the proposals discussed at Canberra by him with Messrs. Spender and Doidge, adding, however, that we were rather puzzled about the suggested addition of the Philippines. I shall be sending you shortly a more comprehensive reply to your message on this subject.

8. I asked him whether he expected there would be any difficulty about making Korea a party to the Treaty, inasmuch as the formal renunciation of Japanese "rights, titles and claims to Korea" would be incorporated in the Treaty itself. He said that he considered that the independence of Korea has been so widely recognized since the end of the war that it cannot sensibly be argued that it must be based on the Peace Treaty. The establishment of diplomatic relations with Korea by many countries and the contents of several resolutions of the General Assembly provide a broad enough legal basis to rebut any juridical objections that might be taken.

9. Finally, Mr. Dulles said that he hoped that the secrecy of the draft Treaty itself would be preserved during the next stages of its discussion. He had no objection to some publicity being given, as the need might arise in dealing with parliamentary and public enquiries, to the general terms of the proposals; it would be unfortunate, however, if the draft itself were to be made public, as that would make it harder for it to be altered in the course of negotiations. He told me that he will be outlining the ideas contained in the draft and the reasons for their inclusion in a speech which he is to deliver in Los Angeles in a few days. He remarked that there could be no assurance that the draft would not leak to the press, mentioning in passing Mr. Romulo's "admirable press relations". He agreed also when I said that it might be broadcast to the world by the Soviet radio, as had been done with the text of the brief Statement of Principles which he had circulated last autumn in New York.

10. If on perusal of these documents points occur to you on which you desire further information, I can readily secure this from Mr. Dulles or Mr. Allison.

TELEGRAM EX-941 Ottawa, April 30, 1951

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following is the text of the memorandum to be given to the State Department. Begins.

Memorandum to the United States re Japanese Peace Treaty

1. The Canadian Government is preparing its comments in detail on the provisional draft of a Japanese Peace Treaty which was annexed to the United States Government's memorandum of March 27, 1951.† However, it has been decided, prior to the completion of more detailed comment, to seek the views of the United States Government on four issues which, in the Canadian Government's view, are of central importance. These issues are, the precedent established by the Japanese peace treaty for the German peace settlement, the question of a proper Chinese signatory, the disposition of former Japanese territory and the security aspects of the treaty. The Canadian Government would be grateful, therefore, to have the views of the United States Government on the questions and suggestions set out below.

Precedent for German Settlement

2. It is certain that the Japanese peace treaty will establish a precedent for the German peace settlement. This will be the case whether consideration is being given to the formal peace treaty for Germany or whether the subject is being pursued in diplomatic discussions among the powers principally concerned with the German peace settlement. The Canadian Government would be interested, therefore, to have the views of the United States Government on the precedent established for the German treaty by a Japanese treaty along the generous lines of the draft under consideration. It would be particularly useful to know whether the United States Government would favour a German settlement which would contain no limits on German rearmament or German heavy industry.

Parties

3. It has been noted that no mention is made in the preamble of the draft under consideration of the exchange of credentials by the signatories, an exchange which is normally covered in any treaty by some such statement as "The under-signed plenipotentiaries, who, after presentation of their full powers, found in due and good form, have agreed ...". The Canadian Government is fully aware of the procedural difficulties faced in the Japanese peace treaty and assume that these difficulties are responsible for the omission.

4. The lack of unanimity among the Governments which, by general consent, have the greatest interest in the Japanese peace treaty as to the proper Chinese signatory poses the major problem. The Canadian Government is concerned in addition with the effect of this problem on future relationships between Japan and China. It might be undesirable, from the point of view of future stability in the area, that Japan be bound to accept the signature of any Chinese Government, upon which the opinion of the Allied Powers is divided, to a treaty with such important implications for itself and China.

5. The Canadian Government shares the views of the United States Government that an early peace treaty with Japan is desirable. For this reason and because of the difficulties already mentioned, we suggest that, while provision be made in the treaty for signature on behalf of China, the signature be delayed for the present. An accession clause could be included in the treaty to which China might later adhere. This procedure could also be followed in the case of other governments which might be unwilling or unable at present to adhere to the treaty.

Territories

6. The Canadian Government is of the opinion that the Japanese peace treaty should, insofar as it is possible, follow the spirit of wartime agreements concerning the disposition of former Japanese territories. It is realized, however, that certain of the territories, notably Formosa, have become issues of international concern apart from their relation to the Japanese peace treaty. In the interests of reaching agreement on the treaty itself, the Canadian Government is of the opinion that Japan should be called on to renounce all her rights, titles and interests in her former territories, leaving their disposition to be decided upon outside a treaty.

7. For this reason we would favour the deletion of Article 5 of the draft under consideration and the simple enumeration of the territories mentioned in it in the first sentence of Article 3 along with the territories already enumerated. The Canadian Government would suggest that the same principle should apply to the territories mentioned in Article 4 of the draft under consideration but would, for the present, wish to reserve its position in regard to this Article.

Security

8. In the note appended to Chapter IV of the draft under consideration, it is stated that the clauses dealing with security are not in themselves complete but are to be supplemented in order to "enable Japan hereafter to contribute to its security without developing armament which could be an offensive threat or serve other than to promote peace and security in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter". The Canadian Government would be interested to have the views of the United States Government as to how supplementary agreements might effectively limit the potential offensive threat of a Japan whose rearmament is not restricted in terms of the peace treaty. Ends.

TELEGRAM WA-1936 Washington, May 8, 1951

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Your messages EX-940† and 941 of April 30th. Japanese Peace Treaty.

1. Mr. Dulles handed me today a memorandum replying to the memorandum contained in your EX-941. The text of this is as follows: Begins:

Response to the memorandum of the Canadian Government to the United States re Japanese Peace Treaty.

Precedent for German Settlement

It is the view of the United States that it would be extremely difficult, perhaps impossible, to conclude either a German peace settlement or a Japanese peace settlement if it were assumed that the provisions of the German settlement must serve as a precedent as regards Japan and that the provisions of the Japanese settlement must equally be precedents applicable to Germany. The Japanese and German situations are dissimilar in many essential respects and it is the view of the United States that the problem of German armament, as well as other German problems, would not necessarily receive the same solution as might be adopted in relation to Japan.

Parties

The United States takes note of the suggestion of the Canadian Government with respect to a later accession to the treaty by China. The United States is not unmindful of the difficulty created by differences of opinion as to the proper Chinese signatory and appreciates the constructive approach of the Canadian Government in this connection.

Territories

The United States notes the suggestion of the Canadian Government that Japan might merely renounce its title to the southern part of Sakhalin Island and the Kurile Islands, rather than cede them to the Soviet Union subject to the proviso (Article 19) that the Soviet Union become a party to the treaty. The United States believes that this subject can with advantage be further considered if and when the ultimate attitude of the Soviet Union toward the treaty is made apparent. The United States has not yet abandoned the hope that the Soviet Union might become a party to the treaty; but if this hope must vanish, the provisions of Article 5 might well be reconsidered.

With respect to Article 4, the United States would not wish to see the future of the Ryukyus and Bonin Islands made less certain than is there indicated.

Security

It is the view of the United States that the way most effectively to limit what the Canadian memorandum calls "the potential offensive threat" of an island nation like Japan is to make the security of the Japan area a matter of collective international concern, which would as a practical matter assure that Japanese armament, if it occurred, would develop as a cooperative, rather than a purely national, project. As the President of the United States indicated in his statement of April 18th, 1951, the United States is prepared now to take what the President referred to as "natural initial steps in the consolidation of peace" in the Pacific Ocean area and, as one of such steps, to enter into a post-treaty security arrangement with Japan.[10] The United States contemplates that this arrangement would establish, in principle, that Japan should not possess armament which could be an offensive threat and further contemplates that, under the arrangement, there would be continuing coordination and cooperation. Text ends.

2. During a brief conversation he made the following points: (a) While he kept closely in touch with those in the State Department who are working on the German settlement, it had been agreed that they would make no effort to correlate the terms of the Japanese treaty with the possible terms of the German settlement. He had secured the concurrence of the German Bureau in the reply in the memorandum to our inquiry. (b) He would be discussing further with the British Government the question of an accession clause for China when he visits London late this month. (c) On the problem of security he repeated his well-known views on the unwisdom of imposing restrictions by the victor on the vanquished of a character which was sure to arouse resentment, pointing out that the North Atlantic countries were already anxious to get rid of the restrictions on rearmament in the Italian Peace Treaty. He said that he had come to the conclusion that unilateral treaty restrictions of this type were almost invariably a mistake as they prevented the development of co-operative relationships. Ends.

RE PEACE TREATY WITH JAPAN AND PACIFIC COAST FISHERIES

Following recent talks on this subject between representatives of our two Departments and consultations with our industry, we have some provisional views on the subject which I should like to place before you for further discussion before our meetings with the United States State Department in Washington at the end of this month.

1. We are anxious to find a method of protecting the West Coast fisheries against encroachment by Japanese or other nationals not concerned until now with the development of those fisheries.

2. Any arrangement that did not take that into account would be difficult for us to accept.

3. The fisheries provisions in the draft Peace Treaty submitted by the United States and by the United Kingdom do not appear to be adaptable for our purpose.[11]

4. The Japanese, not having fished here before the war, should not be put in a better position by the Peace Treaty than they were before the war. Consequently, the Dulles-Yoshida arrangement[12] or the draft provisions of the Peace Treaty as proposed by the United States, would be difficult to accept, particularly since they seem to imply an invitation to Japan to participate in fisheries developed by us in some cases jointly with the United States.

5. In principle, we would agree to the establishment of a triple zone in the Pacific:

(1) Zone of the High Seas adjacent to our coasts which would be subject only to regulation by Canada and the United States and from which Japan would agree to keep out her nationals;

(2) Zone of the High Seas adjacent to the coasts of Japan, which would be subject to the regulation of Japan and other Far Eastern countries and from which we would keep our nationals away;

(3) A middle zone in the Pacific in which we would agree to participate with Japan in joint conservation measures in respect of any fisheries that could be prosecuted by both countries in that zone, e.g. tuna fisheries.

6. If suitable restrictions along lines indicated here cannot be incorporated in the Peace Treaty, it would seem undesirable to include in the Peace Treaty any provision that would have the appearance of inviting Japan to participate in the fisheries adjacent to our West Coast.

7. It may be difficult to incorporate in a single document the divergent views of a number of countries having different interests in the Pacific area. Perhaps instead of trying to find a suitable clause to be inserted in the general Peace Treaty, it might be preferable to have special covenants on fisheries agreed to by separate documents, provided these could be signed by Japan before or concurrently with the signing of the Peace Treaty.

For your information I am enclosing herewith a copy of a resolution† passed unanimously by representatives of all the commercial fisheries organizations on the West Coast. You might also be interested in a resolution† passed at the Pacific Fisheries Conference at its annual meeting in Seattle. A copy of the latter is also enclosed.

Note

Memorandum

SECRET [Ottawa], May 18, 1951

The Canadian Government has given careful attention to the draft of a treaty of peace with Japan proposed by the Government of the United States on March 27. Further to its preliminary comments of May 2, the Canadian Government offers the attached detailed comments for consideration by the Government of the United States. The Articles referred to in the attachment are those of the draft proposed by the Government of the United States.

2. The Canadian Government has drawn on its experience with respect to the Treaty of Peace with Italy in making observations on specific clauses of the United States draft. It would prefer, in several instances, that the wording of the United States draft be made more precise. Experience has proven that the lack of such precision often leads to difficulties of interpretation.

3. The Canadian Government suggests the need for provision of some opportunity for discussion of technical problems by a working party of experts. This procedure would seem of particular importance with respect to fisheries and war claims.

4. The Canadian Government will be interested to have the views of the Government of the United States on the comments and suggestions made in the attachment.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

COMMENTS OF THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT ON THE DRAFT OF A PEACE TREATY FOR JAPAN PROPOSED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Preamble

1. The Canadian Government agrees with the principles contained in the preamble proposed by the United States Government with certain reservations which are set out below. The Canadian Government believes, however, that it would be valuable if the language of the preamble were made more definite and in particular considers that there should be some reference in the preamble to the existence of a state of war between Japan and the Allied Powers.

2. It is suggested that the preamble should contain a list naming the Allied Powers similar to the list contained in the preamble of the Treaty of Peace with Italy.

3. While the Canadian Government would be prepared to encourage Japan to seek membership in the United Nations, it believes that it would be sufficient in the preamble of the treaty to use wording similar to that in the preamble of the Treaty of Peace with Italy. The Allied Powers would thereby be "enabled" to support Japan's application without being called on to accept the obligation implied in the preamble as presently drafted.

4. Although it will be the purpose of the Japanese peace treaty to look to the future in Japan's relationships with the community of nations, there is something to be said for including in the preamble some clause indicative of the fact that conclusion of the peace treaty brings to an end a situation brought on by an aggressive war. This would not be a guilt clause properly speaking but a clause designed to set the outbreak of hostilities in the proper historical perspective. As far as possible, the wording of the clause should avoid offending Japanese susceptibilities and any suggestion of revenge. The Canadian Government suggests, therefore, that there might be included in the preamble a clause along the lines of paragraph 6 of the Potsdam Proclamation. The clause should not stigmatize the Emperor, the present Japanese Government or the people of Japan but might in fact contain commendation of the steps taken by post-war Japan to buttress itself against a repetition of such an abuse of power. It might appear strange in the eyes of the world if Italy alone, the weakest member of the aggressive triumvirate, had to admit its share of responsibility. The Canadian Government therefore suggests some such clause as the following:

> "Japan bears its share of responsibility for precipitating a war of aggression into which her people were deceived and misled by irresponsible and self-willed militarists".

Article 1

5. The Canadian Government agrees that an article terminating the state of war should appear in the treaty.

Article 2

6. The Canadian Government would not at the moment wish to offer any comment on this Article.

Articles 3, 4 and 5

7. The Canadian Government, in its memorandum of May 2 to the United States Government stated that in its opinion "the Japanese peace treaty should, insofar as it is possible, follow the spirit of wartime agreements concerning the disposition of former Japanese territories". In view of the lack of agreement on the disposition of some of the territory involved, we believe there is merit in an approach of the nature suggested in our earlier memorandum which would treat all former Japanese territory in a consistent fashion and not leave the way open for charges of discriminatory treatment of individual pieces of territory. The reply of the United States Government of May 8 did not comment directly on the principle involved in the Canadian suggestion.

8. The Canadian Government does not believe that this suggestion, if adopted, would leave the future of the Ryukyu and Bonin Islands "less certain" than is the case if the United States draft prevails. It is suggested that even more certain wording might be employed. After renunciation by Japan of its rights in the Ryukyu and Bonin Islands is suitably provided for in the treaty, a clause along the following lines might replace the present Article 4:

> "The United States shall have the right to exercise any powers of administration, legislation and jurisdiction over the territory and inhabitants of the Ryukyu Islands south of 29° north latitude, the Bonin Islands, including Rosario Island, the Volcano Islands, Parece Vela and Marcus Island including their territorial waters until such time as they are placed under the trusteeship system of the United Nations".

9. Confusion might arise if no reference is made to the nationality of Japanese domiciled in those territories, the disposition of which is provided for in these articles of the treaty. It is suggested, therefore, that some attention should be given to the inclusion of an article similar in intent to that of Article 19 of the Treaty of Peace with Italy.

10. The Canadian Government suggests that more precise wording might be employed in the case of that portion of Sakhalin with which the treaty is concerned as well as "the islands adjacent to it". It is noted that no provision is made for Quelpart Island which was regarded by Japan as part of Korea.

11. It would not seem necessary that Japan "accept the action of the United Nations Security Council" (Article 3) or "concur in any such proposal" (Article 4) since Japan will be bound by the terms of the treaty upon her signature of it.

Articles 6 and 7

12. The Canadian Government is glad to note from the reply of May 8 of the United States Government that the United States contemplates a post-treaty security arrangement with Japan which "would establish in principle that Japan should not possess armament which could be an offensive threat and further contemplates that under the arrangement there would be continuing co-ordination and co-operation".

13. The Canadian Government would be interested to know why the United States Government thinks it necessary to include Articles 6 and 7 in the treaty. While the Canadian Government does not object to the provisions of the Articles, it believes that they are not legally necessary since Japan could make treaties such as are suggested in Article 7 as a sovereign state and whether or not she joins the United Nations.

14. The Canadian Government is of the opinion that the treaty should contain a clause similar to Article 73 of the Treaty of Peace with Italy providing for the termination of the occupation of Japan.

Article 8

15. On first reading of Article 8 Canadian officials assumed that the phrase, "existing multilateral treaties and agreements designed to promote fair trade practices" was intended to include the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. They have been informed that this was not the intention. If this paragraph is reworded so as to exclude the possibility of misinterpretation, the Canadian Government has no comments of substance.

16. If the problem of possible Japanese accession to the General Agreement should arise in connection with the peace treaty, the Canadian Government would wish to advance the view that it is not appropriate to make any mention of GATT either directly or obliquely in the peace treaty unless the Contracting Parties should have reached prior agreement regarding the terms of Japanese accession. Signatories of the peace treaty which are also Contracting Parties would find themselves in an anomalous position if, after suggesting in the peace treaty that Japan accede to GATT, they were forced to vote against the accession if no satisfactory basis for accession were devised. Moreover it is likely that, regardless of whether or not Japan is enjoined in the peace treaty to accede to GATT, she would apply for membership of her own accord since GATT would almost certainly increase her area of Most-Favoured-Nation treatment with a minimum of reservations.

17. The Canadian Government believes that the appropriate forum for discussion of the accession of Japan to GATT is a future session of the Contracting Parties and that Allied Powers should not be required to place on record (by signature of the treaty) their approval of such accession before it is discussed by the Contracting Parties.

18. Apart from the relevance of this Article to the specific question of membership in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the Canadian Government is of the opinion that Japan should be called on to recognize in more positive terms her obligation to resume her responsibilities under international multilateral instruments to which she was a party at the outbreak of the war. It should be recognized in any such undertaking that Japan might have to be re-admitted to membership in certain organizations of which she ceased to be a member by reason of the outbreak of war before she could again become party to certain of these instruments.

19. The Canadian Government foresees the value of Japan becoming a party to some multilateral instruments to which she has not heretofore been a party. It would seem reasonable that Japan should be called on to seek accession to multilateral instruments concerning matters in which Japan's pre-war record was bad. In this latter regard there are examples in the fields of narcotics, fisheries and commercial practices. The Canadian Government believes undertakings of this type might well be annexed to the treaty, possibly as a voluntary declaration on the part of the Japanese Government.

20 The United States Government will be aware that provisions concerning Japan's future conduct with regard to fisheries are of special interest and importance to the Canadian Government. For that reason it has been suggested that experts from Canada and the United States should meet to discuss this problem. The comments of the Canadian Government on this clause are therefore preliminary and subject to revision in the light of discussions which it is hoped will take place in the near future.

21. The clause as it stands does not appear to cover the period intervening between the signature of the treaty and the coming into force of agreements on fisheries. In addition, no time limit is suggested by which negotiations might either be entered into or completed. It is suggested that these two points might be taken care of in a redraft of the clause. It is further suggested that the latter part of the clause might be redrafted to read:

> "... formulation of new bilateral or multilateral agreements with respect to high seas fisheries among other things for the regulation, conservation and development of high seas fisheries".

Article 10

22. The Canadian Government agrees with the wording of Article 10 but suggests that an additional sentence might be added concerning the registration of treaties, which are renewed, with the Secretariat of the United Nations in accordance with Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations.

Article 11

23. The Canadian Government believes that the "special rights and interests" of Japan in China should be made clear, possibly along the lines of Articles 24 to 26 of the Treaty of Peace with Italy in order to prevent difficulties of interpretation in the future. The Canadian Government is of the opinion that it would be wise to make separate provisions for renunciation by Japan of all rights and interests it may have presumed itself to hold in Manchuria.

Article 12

24. The Canadian Government agrees in principle with the draft clause concerning war criminals. However, it would think it desirable that Japan be called on to accept and respect the convictions and sentences imposed by allied tribunals. The Canadian Government does not believe the treaty should provide for pardon of convicted war criminals since such a suggestion might give a future Japanese Government the opportunity to belittle the whole concept underlying the trial and punishment of proven war criminals. If in some instance evidence is forthcoming to prove the innocence of prisoners now incarcerated, ad hoc arrangements could be made to free the innocent.

Article 13

25. The Canadian Government is in agreement with what it takes to be the objectives of Article 13, namely:

(a) to pave the way for the rapid conclusion of commercial agreements between Japan and the several Allied Powers, and

(b) to require Japan to accord Most-Favoured-Nation treatment in respect of customs duties, etc. to each Allied Power for an initial period, provided that Japan might withhold from any Power treatment more favourable than such Power, subject to the exceptions customarily included in its commercial agreements, is prepared to accord Japan.

26. The Canadian Government considers it desirable to take all practicable steps to assist Japan to re-establish its position as a member in good standing of the world trading community, and thinks that Article 13 would serve a useful purpose in this regard. However, the Canadian Government may find it necessary to retain certain safeguards, not applied to most-favoured-nations generally, against the possibility of unfair competition from Japanese goods, if and when Most-Favoured-Nation treatment is extended to Japan. For example, Canada may wish to retain the right to apply fixed valuations for duty on certain Japanese goods. In this event Canada would be unable to extend Most-Favoured-Nation treatment to Japan without reservation. Canada does not apply fixed valuations to imports from other most-favoured-nations and could not do so under GATT. The Canadian Government would, of course, be prepared to concede to Japan the right to make similar reservations in respect of imports from Canada in the event of the exchange of Most-Favoured-Nation treatment with Japan.

27. The Canadian Government considers that if Japanese trade is to attain the appropriate level, balance, and stability considerable adjustments in the trading position of other countries will be involved. Some countries are more exposed than others to the impact of such adjustments. Canada, for example, is more exposed than certain important trading countries which have much higher Most-Favoured-Nation tariff rates against types of goods exported by Japan and than other such countries which have quantitative restrictions against imports of these goods. Thus the Canadian Government feels that it must retain appropriate means of dealing with possible dumping or concealed subsidies or exchange manipulation or other forms of unfair competition from Japan, and could not agree to any provision in the peace treaty which might prejudice its position in this respect.

Articles 14 and 15

28. The Canadian Government believes that these clauses do not treat in sufficient detail Japan's responsibilities with regard to war claims and Allied property rights and interests. This is a matter which could be best discussed by a working party of experts in the particular subjects and it is suggested that some opportunity be provided for such discussions. The views expressed below are of a general nature and should be considered as preliminary since it is our hope that the subject can be pursued in more detail in the discussions suggested above.

29. The Canadian Government is of the opinion that provision should be made for the liquidation and allocation among the Allied Powers of Japanese external assets in other than Allied countries. It believes that the Treaty should contain recognition by Japan of pre-war debts owed by Japan or Japanese nationals to Allied governments or Allied nationals. The Canadian Government considers that the stock of monetary gold and bullion and of precious metals and jewels, held by Japan at the close of the war and referred to often as the "gold pot", might be marked for distribution among countries with recognized claims to reparations from Japan.

30. The Canadian Government would be interested to have a further statement of the views of the Government of the United States with regard to the exemptions (i to v) set out in Article 14. It is noted that no such exemptions from disposal as reparations of similar classes of German external assets were granted in the Act of Paris on German Reparations. There is a further doubt as to the advisability of certain of these exemptions in that the return of property envisaged might possibly run counter to the domestic legislation of certain of the Allied Powers. The Canadian Government is of the opinion that if any of these exclusions or exemptions is to be retained in the treaty, this provision should merely require the Allied Powers to return the proceeds of the liquidation of exempted assets which they have liquidated without any further obligation on their part towards the Japanese former owners.

31. While the Canadian Government wishes to reserve its position on the question, it offers the following comments on the specific exemptions provided for in Article 14.

(i) The adequacy of the term "special measures" is questioned. It should be noted that the Canadian Government has already returned the proceeds of liquidation of property to a number of Japanese nationals who had been residing in Canada prior to seizure and vesting of their property by the Custodian of Enemy Property.

(ii) The Canadian Government could not return more than the proceeds of liquidation less administrative expenses and other charges even if the principle of return were accepted.

(iii) There is no serious objection to this exemption subject to our general reservations.

(iv) We would be interested to have some clarification of the purpose of this exemption.

(v) The Canadian Government is not convinced of the necessity to return trademarks to Japan except under terms satisfactory to itself.

32. It is questionable whether the penultimate paragraph of Article 14 should be included in a treaty with Japan since it concerns a matter between one Allied Power and another.

33. It is suggested that something should be written into the treaty concerning who is entitled to Japanese assets within territories renounced by Japan or within territory administered by any of the Allied Powers under United Nations trusteeship.

34. A drafting change would seem necessary in the second sentence of Article 14 in order to avoid any question by Japan as to whether property clearly vested in the Custodian of Enemy Property by Canadian legislation is property within Canada's jurisdiction as contemplated in the treaty. The Canadian Government suggests therefore that the words "However, Japan grants ... within their territories" might be replaced by the following: "However, the Allied Powers shall have the right to seize, appropriate, vest and retain in absolute ownership all property and all rights and interests in property of Japan and Japanese nationals which, between December 7, 1941 and September 2, 1945, were, according to their laws subject to their jurisdiction".

35. The Canadian Government considers that the last sentence of Article 15 relating to war loss of or damage to Allied property in Japan is most unsatisfactory. Nothing is known of Japanese domestic legislation on war damage claims nor have we any guarantee that any such legislation might not be revoked after ratification of the treaty. It seems unreasonable to place claimants arbitrarily at the mercy of the Japanese Government in a matter of this kind. In this connection certain of the provisions and safeguards of Article 78 of the Treaty of Peace with Italy should be included, especially the following:

(a) Apart from the actual war damage claims, compensation at an agreed percentage should be payable in respect of any financial loss (other than a loss of profits) incurred as a result of Japanese action.

(b) Provision should be made for compensation on a proportionate basis in respect of direct or indirect holdings by Allied nationals or corporations in Japanese corporations which have suffered war damage or sequestration.

(c) Compensation should be paid free of levies, taxes or other charges and be freely usable in Japan.

(d) The reasonable expenses incurred in Japan in establishing claims including the assessment of loss or damage should be borne by the Japanese Government.

(e) Allied nationals or corporations and their properties should be exempted from and have refunded any exceptional taxes, levies or imposts imposed since December 7, 1941 on their capital assets by the Japanese Government or its agencies for the purpose of meeting the costs of or charges arising out of the war, the occupation or reparations. Japan should be prohibited from levying on Allied nationals or corporations any such exceptional taxes, levies or imposts in the future.

Article 16

36. The Canadian Government agrees with the need for a clause under which Japan would renounce her claims against the Allied Powers for action taken during the war but believes that a more precise definition of the claims to be renounced should be included. It suggests a clause along the lines of Article 76 of the Treaty of Peace with Italy.

37. The Canadian Government is of the opinion that provision might be made for the appointment of special conciliation commissions or tribunals to deal with disputes arising out of individual war claims. While it would be desirable that the President of the International Court should appoint such special tribunals, it would not seem necessary to involve the prestige of the Court itself in disputes of a technical nature and of relatively minor importance. Provisions for the establishment of conciliation commissions or tribunals should be so drafted as to reduce to a minimum the risk of disagreements on such matters as membership of a conciliation commission or tribunal, the rules of procedure thereof, or the stage at which a dispute may be referred thereto. The Canadian Government, having in mind the experience gained with respect to earlier treaties of peace, would suggest that some provision be included in a clause of this nature defining when a dispute may be considered to exist. It might, in addition, be desirable to limit the period for settlement of a dispute through diplomatic channels in order that diplomatic exchanges could not be carried out indefinitely with the object of avoiding a decision.

Article 18

38. The view has already been stated (paragraph 2 above) that a listing of the parties to the treaty should be included in the preamble. The Canadian Government would be interested to know what, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, is the significance of the phrase "in a state of belligerency".

Article 19

39. The Canadian Government has no comment to offer on this Article.

Article 20

40. The Canadian Government would be glad to have the further views of the Government of the United States on the necessity of this Article.

Article 21

41. The Canadian Government agrees with the method of ratification of the treaty suggested in this Article. It has, however, two suggestions to offer. It would prefer that no reference be made directly to the Far Eastern Commission as such but that the parties to the treaty might simply be listed. The Canadian Government further suggests the words "as the principal occupying power" be deleted.

Article 22

42. The Canadian Government notes the re-appearance of the phrase "in a state of belligerency" in this clause to which reference is made in paragraph 38 above. The Canadian Government would suggest that some special provision must be made for participation of Korea in the treaty. While the Canadian Government would have no objection to signature of the treaty by Korea, it believes that no provision is contained in the United States draft which would enable Korea to sign or accede to the treaty.

Additional Clause

43. The Canadian Government believes that Japan should assume special responsibility with respect to Allied war graves. This should include recognition by Japan of duly authorized personnel charged with administrative tasks concerning the maintenance and regulation of Allied war graves and cemeteries. Japan should be called on to facilitate the work of such personnel and to conclude any agreements with the Allied Powers which might be necessary in this respect. The Canadian Government would regard as satisfactory a voluntary declaration by Japan annexed to the treaty provided it were sufficiently precise.

DISCUSSIONS RE JAPANESE FISHERIES

1. In the forthcoming talks with Mr. Dulles on Japanese fisheries, the Minister of Fisheries will put forward views along the lines of the letter from the Department of Fisheries of May 17 which was forwarded to you under letter No. Y-2000 of May 19.†

2. I am satisfied that these views accurately reflect Canadian interest in this particular aspect of the Japanese peace settlement. I share my colleague's opinion of the importance of this issue domestically and I believe the utmost effort must be made to convince the United States of the justice of our case. I realize that this will not be an easy task and that we must avoid two possible dangers: (a) giving the impression to the United States in the forthcoming discussions that we are prepared to recede from our position under United States pressure, and (b) implying that we will not sign the treaty unless they meet us on fisheries, and then giving in as soon as our bluff is called.

3. If United States authorities prove unwilling next week to accept the views which we put forward, it is important that the United States take no final decision to reject our representations. In such circumstances, we should try to keep the situation fluid by a provision for continuing discussion of the subject by representatives of our two governments prior to the signature of the treaty.

4. Mr. Mayhew would like to discuss the subject with you before he meets United States officials and I should be grateful if you would give him whatever assistance you can.

DESPATCH 1986 Washington, May 30, 1951

SECRET

Reference: EX-1144 of May 25, 1951.

DISCUSSIONS RE JAPANESE FISHERIES

The series of discussions with United States officials concerning Japanese fisheries was completed yesterday.

2. The Honourable Mr. Mayhew had a discussion with Mr. Dulles. He was accompanied by Mr. Bates who has prepared a separate report concerning that discussion, two copies of which are enclosed.

3. In addition to that discussion, three meetings of officials were held. Mr. Mayhew was present temporarily at one of these meetings.

4. The Canadian representation was Mr. Bates and Messrs. Matthews and Campbell. The United States team was headed by Mr. Russell Adams, who has been given a special appointment to coordinate under Mr. Dulles United States policy with regard to the Pacific fisheries in relation to the Japanese Peace Treaty. Amongst the United States representatives were Mr. Herrington and Mr. Chapman, whom he is to succeed as fisheries adviser in the State Department. General Snow of the Legal Division of State Department and representatives of the Japanese Desk and of the Economic Division were also present.

5. At the first meeting, Mr. Bates outlined the necessity, from the Canadian point of view, of excluding the Japanese from conserved fisheries in the Northeast Pacific and pointed out the zoning principle outlined in his letter of May 17 to the Under-Secretary as an acceptable solution from the Canadian point of view.

6. It immediately became apparent that the differences of view of the various United States officials had not yet been reconciled. As a basis of discussion, Mr. Adams handed to us two documents, one entitled "Some Tentative Ideas for U.S. High Seas Fishery Policy"† and the other "A Draft International Convention for the Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean".† Eight copies each of these documents are enclosed.

7. The United States officials, when discussing these documents, appeared to fall into four groups as follows:

(a) Political Officers. The main concern of the political officers was that no precedent might be established in the Northeastern Pacific fisheries that might be used by countries in the Western and Southern Pacific in an effort to exclude Japanese fishermen from waters in these areas. For this reason, the zoning proposals put forward by Mr. Bates were not favoured. The political officers appeared to be ready to accept an arrangement similar to that proposed in the draft Convention.

(b) Economic Officer. Mr. Corse, Acting Chief of the State Department Commercial Policy Staff argued strenuously against the exclusion of Japanese fishermen from any of the fisheries in the Northeast Pacific. He based his argument on the general policy of the United States Government against restraints of any type in the economic field but had the grace to admit that the Government was more successful in enforcing this policy in some areas than in others. There seemed to be little sympathy on the part of any of the other United States officials present for his point of view.

(c) Legal Division Representative. General Snow, on behalf of the Legal Division of the State Department, agreed that there should be no difficulty in excluding Japanese fishermen from any of the protected Northeastern Pacific fisheries by means of a treaty or convention. While he did not appear to have taken part in preparing the draft Convention he apparently thought that the desired purpose could be achieved along the lines suggested in that draft.

(d) Fisheries Officials. The fisheries officers of the Department of State and of the Department of the Interior all seemed to be strongly of the same opinion as Mr. Bates that the Japanese fishermen should and could be excluded from the protected fisheries in the Northeastern Pacific. They apparently had first been thinking along the lines of zones which had been referred to by Mr. Bates, but in order to meet the point of view of the political officers had personally prepared the draft Convention.

8. While no general United States view emerged from the discussions, the discussions themselves appeared to be of real value in adding support to the point of view of the United States fisheries officials. At the close of the meeting, Mr. Adams assured us that every effort would be made to develop a United States Government point of view quickly. He undertook to approach us again when this had been done and we told him that, when that had been accomplished, we would be ready to have further discussions with the United States authorities.

9. We stressed the necessity of working out a mutually satisfactory solution to this problem immediately. We pointed out that what was needed was not only a clarification of the United States point of view but a reconciliation of that point of view with the Canadian. When that had been accomplished, we said that, in our opinion, the Japanese should be informed of the basis upon which any fisheries convention might be negotiated. It was also pointed out that, if this Convention could not be signed immediately following the signature of the Peace Treaty, the present wording of the United States Draft Peace Treaty concerning fisheries did not appear to offer sufficient protection to the Canadian-United States interests.

MINUTE ON MEETING BETWEEN MR. DULLES AND HONOURABLE R.W. MAYHEW

On Tuesday, May 29th, Mr. Mayhew met Mr. Dulles in the latter's office at the State Department. Mr. Dulles had Mr. Adams present and I accompanied the Minister.

2. Mr. Mayhew outlined the Canadian views as these had been discussed in Ottawa and approved by Mr. Pearson. It was suggested that the fisheries clause in the present draft treaty and the earlier exchange of correspondence between Mr. Dulles and Premier Yoshida might be taken by the Japanese as an invitation to enter our conserved fisheries in the Northeast Pacific. Mr. Dulles did not believe that the Japanese would so interpret it. Mr. Mayhew referred, however, to the Sealing Convention and to the fact that, when the Japanese informed the U.S. a few weeks ago of their willingness to adhere, they asked at the same time for a share of the skins. Mr. Mayhew suggested that Japan would no doubt have a similar attitude regarding the Halibut and Salmon Conventions.

3. Mr. Dulles emphasized the need to keep fisheries questions out of the general Japanese Peace Treaty because

(a) The Peace Treaty could not include within it an international convention for the North Pacific.

(b) Conflicts of national and international views on the fisheries problems of the Pacific could not be reconciled in any short period of time. Dulles referred particularly to the inability of the U.S. Government to make up its own mind on fisheries, and to the fact that the Philippines, Australia and Latin America all had differing views on matters of fisheries jurisdiction.

(c) The political need within Japan for an early Peace Treaty after almost six years of military occupation.

(d) We could not negotiate a properly acceptable fisheries convention with Japan until she had regained her sovereignty. Otherwise, Japan would regard the convention as having been forced on her during the Occupation. Dulles thought that we and the U.S. should hasten the preparation of a fisheries convention and have it ready for discussion with the Japanese as soon as possible after the signing of the Peace Treaty.

4. Mr. Dulles then referred to the fact that he had passed the whole question of fisheries to Mr. Adams whose job it was to effect an early reconciliation of conflicting views within the U.S. Government. On being reminded that the Treaty did contain a fisheries clause, Mr. Dulles referred to his draft and replied that the clause was broad and general, and the only kind of clause he thought might be accepted by all the powers without creating disputes more properly faced in a separate fisheries convention. He suggested we were unduly nervous in trying to get a Treaty commitment on fisheries from Japan. He said his exchange of correspondence with Premier Yoshida would maintain the status quo until a fishery convention was signed. Mr. Mayhew asked whether he would agree to have some paraphrase of the Premier's undertaking included in the Peace Treaty as the fisheries clause. He flatly said no on the ground that this might raise all sorts of fishery disputes and delay the signing of the Treaty itself. (Because of this statement and to make our position clearer, the Canadian group, discussing the details of a possible fisheries convention with U.S. officials, suggested that our Government might wish a clause inserted in the Treaty requiring Japan to stay out of the conserved fisheries until a separate fisheries convention were completed.)

5. Mr. Dulles reiterated his view that first of all the U.S.A. and then Canada together with the U.S. should determine what they want in a fisheries convention. He was confident that one could be devised that would secure the ends we desired and that it would be acceptable to Japan.

6. This Minute makes no reference to the extensive presentation of the Canadian views made by the Honourable R.W. Mayhew, since these are already on file in External Affairs as well as in the Department of Fisheries.

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY; DRAFT PROPOSALS

5. The Minister of Public Works as Acting Prime Minister, referring to the discussion at the meeting of March 15th, 1951, reported that the United States and the United Kingdom had now reached agreement on a draft peace treaty for Japan. The Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs had submitted a copy of the draft treaty with a covering note for the information of the Cabinet, since the U.S. government planned to publish the draft on July 12th.[13]

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Memorandum, Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs and attached draft Treaty, July 9, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 189-51)†

6. The Secretary to the Cabinet said that the U.S. government had requested the comments of other governments by July 20th and that it was expected that recommendations in this connection would be available for Cabinet consideration before that date. The present text of the treaty contained a number of provisions arising from earlier Canadian comments and it was unlikely that any substantial changes would be recommended to Cabinet. The U.S. government hoped that, after it had received the comments of interested governments, it would be possible to hold an early conference of a largely formal nature for the purpose of signing the treaty.

7. The Minister of Fisheries indicated that Article 9 of Chapter 4 of the draft treaty, regarding fisheries questions, was satisfactory to his department, on the understanding that arrangements would be made for the terms of the Dulles-Yoshida exchange of letters of February 7th, 1951 to apply to the whole Pacific area. In this correspondence the Japanese government had undertaken that its fishermen would not enter waters in which they had not fished in 1940, pending the conclusion of bilateral and multilateral agreements providing for the regulation or limitation of fishing and the conservation and development of fisheries on the high seas.

8. The Cabinet, after further discussion noted the report from the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs as submitted by the Acting Prime Minister, regarding the text of the draft peace treaty for Japan that had been approved by the U.S. and U.K. governments, and the comment of the Minister of Fisheries that Article 9 of Chapter 4 of the treaty was acceptable to his department, subject to the application to the whole Pacific area of the terms of the Dulles-Yoshida exchange of letters of February 7th, 1951; any recommendations as to further Canadian comments to be considered at a subsequent meeting.

JAPANESE FISHING

1. We have learned from Allison that it is the intention of the Japanese Government to issue the following statement very shortly with respect to fishing matters: Statement begins:

"In order that there shall be no misunderstanding the Japanese Government confirms that Japan's voluntary declaration in respect of fishing conservation contained in the Prime Minister's letter of the 7th February 1951 to Mr. John Foster Dulles, the special representative of the President of the United States, was intended to embrace fishery conservation arrangements in all parts of the world. The Government of Japan will in accordance with the above mentioned letter be prepared, as soon as practicable after restoration to it of full sovereignty, to enter into negotiations with other countries with a view to establishing equitable arrangements for the development and conservation of fisheries which are accessible to the nationals of Japan and such other countries. The Government of Japan reaffirms that in the meantime it will, as a voluntary act, implying no waiver of its international rights, prohibit Japanese nationals and Japanese registered vessels from carrying on fishing operations in presently conserved fisheries in all waters, where arrangements have already been made either by international or domestic act, to protect the fisheries from over-harvesting and in which fisheries Japanese nationals or Japanese registered vessels were not in the year 1940 conducting operations." Statement ends.

2. You will note that this proposed statement by the Japanese Government reiterates the language contained in Prime Minister Yoshida's letter of February 7 to Mr. Dulles. We observed that in this statement the Japanese Government does not prohibit its nationals from fishing in conserved waters "pending the conclusion of negotiations", as suggested in paragraph two of CRO telegram No. 35 of June 28.† Allison said that the United States would be firmly opposed to the phrase "pending the conclusion of negotiations", which could result in indefinite Japanese exclusion without negotiation. Allison maintained that the phrase "in the meantime", as it appeared in the Yoshida-Dulles letter and in the proposed statement by the Japanese Government, means that the Japanese voluntarily exclude themselves from conserved fisheries, on the understanding that negotiations for agreement about such fisheries will be entered into within a reasonable time.

3. It appears very unlikely that the United States would agree to the addition of a clause to Article 9 of the proposed peace treaty with Japan, which would contain the substance of the Yoshida-Dulles letter. It therefore seems some advance that the United States has been persuaded of the necessity to have the Japanese Government make a public confirmation of the voluntary declaration with respect to conserved fisheries which was contained in Yoshida's letter of February 7.

4. We understand that the proposed statement by the Japanese Government has been made available to Clutton in Tokyo.[14]

[14] Le Cabinet a décidé que cette déclaration, que le gouvernement du Japon a publiée le 10 juillet, rendait les modifications à l'article 9 inutiles.
Cabinet agreed that this statement, which the Japanese Government issued on July 10, made the revision of Article 9 no longer necessary.

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY

Following for Wrong from Reid.

1. You will remember our discussion of last week concerning the possible effect of early signature of the Japanese Peace Treaty on settlement of the Korean war. The Minister has now agreed that you might make our apprehensions on this score known to Rusk informally. Our thoughts on the subject run along the following lines:

(a) Our main objective is to provide for some degree of stability in the Far East which, we hope, would remove the constant danger of disagreements there leading to world war. The Korean war is the most immediate danger point. Present negotiations for a cease-fire in Korea suggest the possibility of reaching agreement with the Chinese Communist Government and indirectly with the U.S.S.R. not only on a cease-fire but on some sort of modus vivendi. To rush signature of a Japanese settlement would add to the difficulties of reaching a modus vivendi with the Chinese Communist Government.

(b) How far is our main objective, referred to in the preceding paragraph, served by signing a Japanese peace treaty which so far as China and the U.S.S.R. are concerned has no effect? We recognize the good sense and realism of the terms of the treaty. If however it cannot be made really effective because of the non-association with it of two countries which because of geography and economic ties are of first-rate importance to Japan, of what real value is the treaty?

(c) We fear that the compromise proposal on Chinese participation in the treaty may tend to increase the likelihood of signature of the treaty by the Chinese Nationalist Government. If Japan chooses to negotiate with the Communist Government of China, a situation might soon arise in which a supposed ally of the United States was doing business with a recognized foe of the United States. United States public and congressional opinion would scarcely regard this development with detachment and might press the United States Government to forestall such a development by using its influence to convince the Japanese Government of the unwisdom of such negotiations.

(d) We supported the idea of concluding a peace treaty with Japan, if necessary without the participation of the U.S.S.R. and China, when it seemed certain that they would be unreasonable in their demands. However, now that substantial agreement on the terms of the treaty has been reached by the non-Communist powers could we not afford to delay signature, at least until we have a clearer idea of the extent to which the Communist powers are willing to negotiate a reasonable Far Eastern settlement?

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY

Following for Reid from Wrong, Begins: I went over most of the issues raised in your message with Rusk yesterday afternoon, making it clear that I was not addressing representations to him but was only asking for comment on some matters which seemed to be reasonable causes of worry. As I expected, I got no indication that there was any readiness to delay the timetable for the treaty.

2. Perhaps the most substantial point he made was that it was really essential that the occupation in Japan should be ended as soon as possible. Six years, he said, was a very long time for a military occupation and the sands were running out. The main purpose of seeking to attach Japan to the democratic powers would be prejudiced if there is any further delay. He mentioned the expectations built up in Japan as a result of MacArthur's repeated advocacy of an early treaty when he was Supreme Commander and of Dulles' negotiations with the Japanese Government.

3. He thinks that there is no chance that the Russians would agree to a peace treaty which would seem reasonable to the rest of us. While it is true that there is little in the latest draft which is in conflict with Russian declarations about the nature of the peace treaty, the fact is that they are bitterly opposed to the bilateral security arrangements between the United States and Japan which are a central part of the whole settlement. A main aim of their Far Eastern policy is to block such arrangements, and he suggested that one purpose of their support of a Korean cease-fire may have been to put them in a better position to achieve this end.

4. He remarked on the great change in the distribution of power in the world which the western countries are seeking to achieve within the next year or two through bringing their defeated enemies of Germany and Japan into their group, and through NATO and rapid rearmament. To prevent or hinder this process must be the central aim of Russian foreign policy.

5. I commented that I thought that the timetable for the treaty was unlikely to be fulfilled, quite apart from any Russian tactics, and asked him whether he considered it likely that the Russians would send a delegation to San Francisco. He agreed that this was possible, but said that if they did so it might only extend the conference to a fortnight or so and that the results should be the signature of the treaty in approximately its present form by the rest of us.

6. He said that he would give further consideration to my remarks, and added that he understood that the United Kingdom Government did not share our worries and was anxious that the treaty should be signed on schedule.

7. The question of Japanese negotiations after the treaty with one or other Chinese authority was discussed with Allison before receipt of your message, and the result has been reported by despatch.† Ends.

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 204-51 [Ottawa], July 27, 1951

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY

On July 23 the United States Embassy handed to the Department of External Affairs a memorandum covering the current text of the draft treaty of peace with Japan and an invitation to attend the conference in San Francisco on September 4, 1951, to sign a treaty, the final draft of which will be circulated on August 13. Attached is a printed copy of the current draft.[15]

2. This draft is still theoretically subject to amendment as a result of comment by the countries to which it was circulated, i.e. by all the countries which were in a state of war with Japan except China. However, experience has shown that the United States is reluctant to accept amendments and it is to be expected that the final draft which the Canadian government has been invited to sign will be substantially similar to the present one.

3. The treaty reduces Japanese territory to the four main islands of Japan and the minor islands around them. It restores complete sovereignty to Japan and places no curbs on its armament or any of its industries. It is also the foundation for a separate security arrangement between the United States and Japan.

4. Neither government of China has been invited to sign the treaty because the United States and the United Kingdom hold different views as to which is the proper government of China. Although the U.S.S.R. has been invited to attend the conference, it seems unlikely that it will accept because of the form of the invitation and the text of the treaty.

5. We have doubts about the timing of the treaty. There is a remote possibility that China and the U.S.S.R. are anxious to reach some overall settlement in the Far East following an armistice in Korea; signature of the treaty now may make any chance of a general agreement in the Far East more remote. Doubts about the wisdom of the timing of the treaty spring not from any wish to give China and the Soviet Union just the delay they want, nor from a desire to prolong an occupation which has already continued too long but from an anxiety lest the conclusion of the treaty may destroy what may conceivably be the best chance of an overall settlement in the Far East which has appeared for some years.

6. We view the wording of the claims clauses of the treaty with some reserve. It is the opinion of the Custodian of Enemy Property that the language of Chapter V is so vague as to make the administration of claims contentious. The United States has consented to a short meeting of experts from Canada and the United States to clarify the language of this chapter.

7. There are two Canadian life insurance companies which had a considerable stake in Japan before the war. An amendment to the Protocol to the treaty is likely by which our interests in life insurance should be reasonably well met.

8. Our wishes with respect to ensuring that the Japanese will not return to their prewar malpractices in fishing on the high seas have been adequately met as a result of action by the Department of Fisheries.

9. The Asian states appear to be divided in their attitude towards the treaty. While India and Pakistan have not yet made their attitude clear, it is probable that on balance they will decide to sign. Indonesia is reported to have accepted the invitation to the conference but Burma is so strongly opposed to the omission of any effective provision for reparations that the Burmese Embassy in Washington has informed our Embassy there that "the Burmese government will not sign the peace treaty with Japan as presently proposed by the United States government". The Philippines also are discontented by the lack of provision for substantial reparations.

10. There is a Protocol attached to the treaty on contracts, periods of prescription, negotiable instruments, and contracts of insurance. This Protocol is of interest only to a limited number of countries because so few had interests in Japan of the type covered in the Protocol. The Protocol is sponsored by the United Kingdom which will be the principal signatory; the United States intends to decline to sign the Protocol for constitutional reasons.

11. There are two arguments in favour of signing the proposed treaty. First, Canada has long supported the idea of an early peace treaty with Japan. It was for this reason that the Minister of National Defence attended a conference on the Japanese peace treaty in Canberra, Australia, in August and September of 1947. It is considered that, while democratic institutions are still not firmly rooted in Japan, the sheltering effect of continued occupation is unlikely to establish them more strongly. Secondly, the United States sets great store by the conclusion of a treaty at the present time and the early termination of the occupation. This treaty is part of the United States' arrangements for the defence of the Pacific, and the responsibility for appearing to threaten those arrangements by refusing to sign would be very grave.

12. It is therefore recommended that, in spite of the drawbacks attaching to the present draft and the manner in which it was formulated, authority be granted to accept the invitation to sign a peace treaty with Japan substantially similar to that contained in the attached draft. The final draft of the treaty as published on August 13 next will be placed before Cabinet as soon as it is received with a request for final authorization to sign. At that time also the revised Protocol, taking into account the interests of the two Canadian life insurance companies, will be presented in order to seek authority to sign it.

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY; CANADIAN COMMENTS AND SIGNATURE

10. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of July 18th, 1951, said that Canada had been invited to attend the conference in San Francisco on September 4th, 1951, to sign a treaty of peace with Japan. The final draft would be circulated on August 13th. Chapter V of the treaty, on claims, was somewhat vague and a meeting of U.S. and Canadian experts would attempt to clarify the language. An amendment to a protocol to the treaty was likely to cover the interests of Canadian life insurance companies. Canadian fishing interests had been met as a result of action by the Department of Fisheries. On the whole the treaty was acceptable and it was recommended that Canada be represented at the conference and, subject to approval of the final draft, that authority be granted to sign the treaty.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum, for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, July 27th and attached draft peace treaty — Cab. Doc. 204-51)

11. Mr. Pearson added that it did not appear to be necessary to have a delegation attend the San Francisco meeting. It would be desirable if the Minister of Fisheries could be one of the signatories for Canada.

12. The Prime Minister felt that, if the foreign ministers of the principal countries attended the San Francisco meeting, it would be desirable for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to be a signatory.

13. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration pointed out that, in view of the signature of the peace treaty, consideration would shortly have to be given to the question of admission to Canada of a number of persons now in Japan, some of whom were legally entitled to come to Canada. The question of immigration generally would also have to be examined.

14. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed that:

(a) Canada accept the invitation to attend the conference in San Francisco on September 4th, 1951 on the treaty of peace with Japan; and,

(b) subject to examination of the final draft of the peace treaty as published on August 13th and the revised protocol, authority be granted to sign the treaty and protocol on behalf of Canada.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], August 8, 1951

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY

The following outlines important developments with respect to the draft Japanese Peace Treaty since preparation of our memorandum of July 27 to Cabinet on the subject. A copy of that memorandum is attached for easy reference. We have found evidence now that the lack of enthusiasm apparent in that memorandum is shared by other countries who will be "principal parties" to the treaty.

2. On July 30, Mr. Satterthwaite, Deputy Director of the Office of British Commonwealth and North European Affairs at the State Department, discussed the draft treaty with Mr. Reid and other members of the Department. The meeting was suggested by the State Department and could be considered as a belated attempt at fulfilling at least the proprieties of consultation. Mr. Satterthwaite brought "draft" memoranda which purported to be answers to all our comments, formal and informal, dating back to May 18 which had at the time of the meeting not been acknowledged. An important outcome of the meeting was agreement by the State Department to provide the opportunity for a meeting of technical experts on the war claims clauses. Representatives of our Custodian's Office and the Department of Finance met with their United States counterparts on August 1 and 2 in Washington. While we do not as yet have detailed information on the talks we have been informed orally by the Custodian's Office that the meetings served to clear up a good many technical difficulties and were conducted in a friendly manner. The United States representative in fact said that aside from the United Kingdom the Canadian Government was the only government which had offered helpful and reasonable comments on the draft treaty.

3. The views of interested Asian states are clearer now than at the time our memorandum to Cabinet was prepared. The Indian Government may take the lead in presenting the "Asian view". It has suggested to the United States Government the following changes in the treaty.

(a) The deletion of the provision for possible trusteeship and interim United States administration of the Ryukyus and Bonins.

(b) The cession of Formosa, the Pescadores, Sakhalin and the Kuriles to China and Russia respectively, leaving the question of when Formosa goes to China until later.

(c) The deletion of the final sentence of Article 6 (a) of the draft treaty which refers to the possible "stationing or retention of foreign armed forces in Japanese territory".

4. The last objection is probably the most important. In communicating its views to the United States Government the Indian Government has made it clear that India would not want to sign a treaty which would in effect make Japan a United States bastion against China. Japan would willingly sign a subsequent treaty with the United States and India does not object to such an agreement. The reference in the treaty to the stationing of foreign armed forces in Japanese territory however constitutes an improper infringement upon the sovereignty of Japan.

5. The Indian Government has also made it clear to the United States Government that the treaty should promote settlement of Far Eastern issues and should fit into any new arrangements likely to emerge after a Korean cease fire. The treaty should be such that China and Russia could sign it or a similar treaty later. On these points our views are similar to those of the Indian Government. Our doubts on the timing of the treaty have been expressed informally to the State Department. We have in addition questioned the necessity of the security clauses (Articles 5 and 6) both in our formal memorandum to the United States Government of May 18 and in discussion with Mr. Satterthwaite on July 30. The clauses are not legally necessary and are the ones to which China and the U.S.S.R. could not reasonably be expected to agree. Mr. Satterthwaite, after telephoning our views on this particular point to Allison on July 30 informed us that Mr. Dulles was firm on the necessity of these clauses.

6. India doubts the wisdom of the Burmese stand on reparations and has informed the Burmese Government that India saw no point for the present in a reported Indonesian proposal for a meeting in Rangoon to consider the treaty. Sir Zafrulla Khan informed our High Commissioner in Karachi that although Pakistan would be content to see Japan free of reparations, Pakistan may, because of its close relations with Burma, the Philippines and Indonesia, be forced to give these countries some support in their demands for reparations. It is probably safe to assume that no matter what particular issue is chosen by these states for criticism, their real difficulty is their desire to avoid antagonizing Communist China. They are anxious that the treaty should be such that their signature of it will not indicate any agreement to take sides in the struggle in the Far East.

7. Mr. Stikker has told our Ambassador in The Hague that certain of the United States proposals in the draft are unpalatable to the Dutch people and Government. The Dutch Government will find the war claims and reparations clauses particularly difficult to accept. We are not certain how far the Dutch protest will be carried. The French Government has made some suggestions and changes in the draft and "insists" that the Associated States of Indo-China be invited to sign the treaty. In the United Kingdom several Labour members from textile, pottery and shipbuilding areas managed to stage an impromptu debate on the draft treaty just before Parliament rose on August 2. They protested against the shortness of time spent on the treaty in the foreign affairs debate on July 25. Left Wingers also argued that the United Kingdom, a great trading nation, was having its trade "rubbed out by strategic considerations dictated purely by another nation".

8. A further point has arisen concerning the status of the territories in which in the treaty Japan renounces legal title. Our Legal Division is of the opinion that renunciation by Japan of her rights and titles in Formosa, the Pescadores, Sakhalin and the Kuriles provides China and the U.S.S.R. respectively with legal title to the territories. The Foreign Office Legal Adviser has agreed with this argument. We have not informed the State Department of our view although we have requested its views on the status of these islands. While we have not received an answer to this query it seems clear from other correspondence that the United States holds the view that the treaty does not and should not transfer sovereignty over the territories in question to China and the U.S.S.R.

9. The information set out above suggests the desirability of keeping any public statement the Canadian Government might make in support of the treaty moderate in tone. The treaty has much to recommend it but it is not without fault and may yet give rise to public differences of opinion between the United States and friendly Asian governments. Indeed these governments, apart from the Philippines, may refuse to sign the treaty. I should be grateful for your direction as to whether you consider it desirable for us to support India's stand in respect to the security clauses or whether we should leave it to the Indian Government to argue this point alone with the United States Government.

I attach for your information a copy of WA-3087 of August 13† which indicates that the U.S.S.R. has accepted an invitation to the Japanese peace conference in San Francisco. According to the attached telegram the United States now plans to send two groups to San Francisco. This probably indicates the United States' intention to have strong representation at San Francisco on both the political and official levels and that the United States delegation will be prepared to deal with any objections which the U.S.S.R. may offer on details of the treaty.

2. There is increasing evidence that the conference at San Francisco may become more than a mere signing conference. We can be certain that the Soviet representatives will attempt to raise substantive issues with respect to the treaty. Indonesia has already expressed the view to the United States government that the substance of the treaty should be discussed at San Francisco. We do not know how far India will go in publicly pressing for the revisions in the security and territorial clauses which she has already suggested. Pakistan may feel compelled to offer public support to the claims for further reparations which Indonesia, the Philippines and Burma have requested. The Netherlands representative might press this same point, if only for the record, since the Dutch government is concerned with the domestic reaction it will face, if it accepts without protest the very limited compensation clauses of the draft treaty. While it is conceivable that the United States might agree to minor changes in the text of the treaty, it is unlikely that it will admit to substantial revision. However, it does seem likely that the proceedings will be extended beyond the United States idea of formal statements by delegations in support of the draft.

3. In the light of the above, you may consider it desirable to increase the Departmental complement of the delegation. You might also think it advisable to have a representative of the Custodian's office with the delegation in the event that the war claims clauses are subject to special study.[17]

Authority is required for signature on behalf of Canada of a Japanese Peace Treaty and a Protocol to the treaty, the texts of which are attached. These documents were given to the Department of External Affairs on August 17 by the United States Embassy in Ottawa. A draft text, dated July 20, was circulated for the Cabinet's consideration, under a memorandum of July 27. The final text does not differ substantially from that earlier text.[18]

2. The treaty is a generous one, completely restoring Japan's sovereignty, imposing no restrictions on Japan's economy, allowing for Japanese rearmament, and requiring very limited reparations from Japan. Canada has had some opportunity to influence the text, in secret exchanges through diplomatic channels in the past six months.

3. A revision of special interest to two Canadian Life Insurance companies has been made in the Protocol to the treaty. Section E of the Protocol, entitled "Life Insurance Contracts", is the revision in question and its wording is satisfactory to the Canadian Insurance companies. The Protocol will be signed as a separate agreement by interested countries at the same time as signature of the main treaty takes place.

4. On August 14, the U.S.S.R. accepted the invitation to the conference. Previous to that, the Soviet Union had refused to participate in discussion of the drafts of the treaty which had been circulated. The Soviet delegation to the peace conference has been named and is a strong one headed by Mr. Gromyko. It is likely that the Soviet representatives will make every effort to use the conference as a stage from which to direct propaganda attacks against the policies of Western states, and particularly of the United States, in the Far East. It can be assumed that the Soviet delegation will attempt to delay signature of the treaty but it is unlikely that the conference can be sabotaged, no matter what the Soviet representatives do. It is not expected that they will sign the treaty. On August 17, a telegram was received by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Chinese Communist Government. The telegram contained the text of a statement by Chou En-lai, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Chinese Communist Government, attacking the peace treaty. The message declared that if the Chinese Communist Government was excluded from the preparation, drafting and signing of the peace treaty with Japan, it would consider the treaty "illegal and therefore null and void".

5. The conference has been called for "conclusion and signature" of the treaty on the terms of the attached text. It is certain that no basic amendments will be acceptable to the sponsoring governments. It is unlikely that even textual revision will be permitted.

6. It is therefore recommended that:

(a) authority be granted for signature on behalf of Canada of the attached treaty;

(b) the Canadian Delegate be given authority to agree to minor revisions of the treaty in the event that such revisions are accepted by a majority of powers represented at the conference, and

(c) authority be granted for signature of the Protocol to the treaty.[19]

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY — PROCEDURE

1. The following are our general comments on United States provisional draft of the Rules of Procedure for the Japanese Peace Conference, the text of which was contained in your telegram under reference.

2. The Rules of Procedure are unsatisfactory from our point of view in that they are alien to our parliamentary practice; nor do they resemble the Rules of Procedure employed by the United Nations General Assembly which are recognized internationally. While we fully appreciate the purposes for which these rules are formulated, we are not convinced that they provide the best method for achieving those purposes and we would find it difficult to give them our public support in their present form.

3. The one-hour guillotine is particularly distasteful to us and we believe it will be to others. We suggest in its stead that no limitation as to time be imposed for the "first round" of statements. It would be physically impossible, we believe, for each

[19] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 22 août 1951./Approved by Cabinet, August 22, 1951.

Communist plenipotentiary delegate to speak more than three or four hours. It is unlikely that other delegations would wish in their opening statements to speak more than one hour. The net result, as we see it, would be a prolongation of the Conference by some 15 to 18 hours. We believe, in addition, that no limitation need be placed on the time allowed for Points of Order, since it is unlikely that Points of Order would be raised with respect to prepared statements of policy. Such a course would avoid what in our mind is a most invidious precedent and would get by the "first round" of the Conference without the procedural wrangle and the unnecessary ill-feeling which can certainly be expected over the one-hour limitation. We believe that the limited prolongation that would ensue is not a matter of great issue.

4. If our suggestion is accepted, we would be prepared to consider support of proposals along the lines of the first paragraph of Article 17 as presently drafted to cover the "second round" of statements and discussions. We do not believe that our suggestion, if implemented, would allow the proceedings to get out of hand, a development which we are agreed should be avoided.

5. It should be apparent to the State Department that the more acceptable the draft Rules of Procedure are to friendly governments, the more willing support will be offered in the adopting of those rules by the Conference. We believe the Soviet representatives may gain more attention by challenging arbitrary procedural rulings having little relation to the normal practice of many of the states at the Conference than would be the case if they were allowed to talk themselves out. The Treaty will be signed by a majority of the states at the Conference, no matter how vicious the Soviet propaganda attacks. We should be careful, therefore, not to offer the Soviets any grounds for additional arguments on matters of procedure in support of their probable main theme that the United States is bulldozing the treaty through with the aid of a group of satellites.

6. My immediately following telegram† contains more detailed criticism of the provisional Rules of Procedure and will amplify these general comments. I would be grateful if you would inform the State Department as soon as possible of the views set out in these two telegrams.

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY — PROCEDURE

1. Allison was informed this afternoon of the views expressed in your messages EX-1709 and 1710† of August 29th. The detailed comments outlined in EX-1710 were left with Allison in the form of a memorandum to be considered by the State Department.

2. Allison appeared disconcerted at our general approach and expressed surprise that we should argue for rules of procedure based on United Nations or parliamentary precedent. He pointed out that the purpose of the San Francisco Conference is not for negotiation but for signature and he said that the United States Government therefore thought it not illogical that special rules of procedure should be devised to ensure that the stated purpose of the Conference should be achieved. He observed that, if the Russians wished to negotiate on the substance of the Treaty, they had had their chance in the six months during which the terms of the Treaty were under diplomatic negotiation.

3. He said that if the principle of limiting speech-making at the Conference were not adhered to, there would be no telling what the result might be. One probable result would be that the Russians would so monopolize the time of the Conference as to make it impossible for all delegates to have their say. It was thought fairer to institute a time limit which applied equally to all delegations.

4. Allison did not think that the placing of no time limit on discussion of points of order would have a happy result. He said that it would be unwarrantably optimistic to expect the Russians to confine themselves either to few or to reasonable points of order. In consequence there would have to be a succession of rulings out of order by the Chairman and challenges by the Russians which might well be less desirable, as a matter of tactics, than having established time limits for the discussion of points of order.

5. Allison said that these were only his personal opinions and that he would discuss the Canadian views with Dulles.

6. Dulles, Allison and others of the United States delegation are flying to San Francisco tomorrow. Allison said that further exchanges of views could be carried out with the Canadian delegation in San Francisco.

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY

The Conference for the signing of the Japanese Peace Treaty opened in San Francisco on September 4 and the Treaty was signed as scheduled on September 8.[20] The proceedings at San Francisco were conducted under very strict rules of procedure which prevented filibustering tactics and which limited the delegates' speeches on the Treaty to one hour each.[21] It was not in any sense a real conference but rather a gathering of representatives of 51 countries at which the views of each country of an already agreed draft treaty were expressed. There was no opportunity for amending the Treaty. The Treaty was signed by the representatives of 48 countries. The delegates of the U.S.S.R., Czechoslovakia and Poland did not sign the Treaty.

2. The Communist Delegations offered opposition to the Treaty on both substance and procedure. However, the impression was left that Mr. Gromyko and his associates put up only a half-hearted struggle. The debate on the adoption of Rules of Procedure gave the Communist Delegations the only opportunity to prolong the Conference and they did not seem to take full advantage of that opportunity but seemed to content to appear as victims of United States steam-roller tactics. Mr. Gromyko called a press conference in the hour immediately preceding the signing of the Treaty on September 8, at which he repeated his charges that the Treaty was a treaty for war and not for peace. His prepared statement to the press conference ended with the warning that "those who impose such a peace treaty with Japan take upon themselves all the responsibility before the peoples for the consequences of such a step".

3. The greatest interest was displayed in the statements of the Asian Delegates at the Conference. The delegates from Indonesia and the Philippines indicated their dissatisfaction with the reparations clauses of the Treaty and reserved the position of their Governments with respect to implementation of these clauses. It was apparent from the speeches of most of the Asian delegates that those countries, which must live in proximity to Japan, were not completely convinced that the "peace of reconciliation" with Japan would be entirely successful. Each of them offered cause why it would be difficult for their countries to forget Japanese wartime aggression.

4. The Japanese Delegation to the Conference was headed by the Prime Minister Mr. Yoshida. Shortly after his arrival in San Francisco Mr. Yoshida called on the representatives of countries which Japan had occupied during the war. Throughout the Conference he called on the Heads of other delegations, including Mr. Pearson. Aside from these formal calls, the Japanese Delegation pursued a cautious and discreet course throughout the Conference proceedings. (RESTRICTED)

PÊCHERIES DE L'OCÉAN PACIFIQUE NORD
NORTH PACIFIC FISHERIES

969. DEA/4606-D-40

Rapport du sous-ministre des Pêcheries

Report by Deputy Minister of Fisheries

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, January 31, 1952

TRIPARTITE FISHERIES CONFERENCE CANADA-JAPAN-UNITED STATES, IN TOKYO, NOVEMBER 5TH-DECEMBER 14TH, 1951

1. This conference on North Pacific Fisheries questions was called by Japan, with invitations going only to the United States and Canada. In the Japanese Peace Treaty the Government of Japan had undertaken to enter promptly into negotiations with other nations with respect to the conservation of fisheries resources in the high seas. Although the Peace Treaty had not yet been ratified by a majority of the signatory countries or by the United States, the Supreme Commander had given the Government of Japan ad hoc powers to negotiate a fisheries treaty on equal footing with Canada and the United States.

2. The Canadian representatives at the conference were the Honourable R.W. Mayhew, Minister of Fisheries, Mr. Stewart Bates, Deputy Minister of Fisheries, Mr. E.T. Applewhaite, M.P., Mr. Arthur R. Menzies, Canadian Diplomatic Representative in Tokyo, Mr. S.V. Ozere, Legal Adviser, Department of Fisheries, Dr. John L. Hart, Director, Pacific Biological Station and Mr. John M. Buchanan, President, British Columbia Packers, Limited.

3. The Japanese delegation included the Minister of Agriculture and the Vice/Minister of Foreign Affairs, but they were present only at the opening and closing plenary sessions. The negotiations were conducted by the Honourable Iwao Fujita, Director of the Fisheries Agency, Mr. Masao Sogawa of the Fisheries Agency, and Mr. Jun Tsuchiya, Director of the European and American Affairs Bureau of the Foreign Office. The remainder of the Japanese delegation comprised industrial advisers, members of the House Committees on Fisheries and officials of the Foreign Office.

4. The United States delegation was headed by Mr. W.C. Herrington, Special Assistant to the Under-Secretary of State. Two other Washington officials and five industrial advisers made up the remainder of the United States delegation.

Background

5. The main concern of Canada and the United States was that species of fish in the Eastern Pacific seas which had been conserved by us jointly or severally should not be open to free fishing on the part of the Japanese. The conservation of these main species (salmon, halibut, herring) has been costly to both Canada and the United States, to the governments, and to the fishing industries. The stocks so built up, however, spend most of their lives on the high seas where there is a generally accepted right of free fishing for all nations. Before the last war, Japanese factory ships had crossed to Bristol Bay area but had met strong diplomatic protests from the United States. With the improvement in fishing techniques, Japanese factory ships are now able to fish at even greater distances from their home bases and to do this economically. The loss of the Kamchatka salmon fishery to the Russians might be expected to lead to an intensification of Japanese fishing on the North American side of the Pacific. The limitation of other resources following her defeat might likewise be expected to induce Japan to try to make still greater use of the free resources on the high seas. For long she has been the world's leading fishing nation and the above conditions all suggest her need for a still further development of this basic industry.

6. To provide some satisfactory protection against these possibilities the United States Government pressed Japan to convene this tripartite fisheries conference.

United States Draft Treaty

7. When the United States Government was preparing the terms of the general Peace Treaty, its Mr. Foster Dulles reached an agreement with Prime Minister Yoshida of Japan who announced in February, 1951, that Japan would prohibit her nationals from carrying on fishing operations in the conserved fisheries of other countries until negotiations for fisheries treaties could be undertaken. The United States State Department thereupon prepared a draft fisheries treaty† that would be supplemental to the peace treaty itself. The preliminary United States draft was shown to the Canadian Government in April and there followed prolonged discussions on the principle of the treaty to be negotiated. Only on the eve of the conference itself did Canada and the United States reach agreement on the kind of treaty they wished to negotiate with Japan. Indeed the conference had to be postponed for three weeks to permit settlement of the Canadian-American differences before their delegations proceeded to Japan.

8. The first United States draft proposed certain principles. In brief, the suggestion was that nations through bilateral or multi-lateral agreement should abstain from the exercise of their right under International Law to participate in the harvesting of a high seas fishery resource (a) when a country has that resource under scientific study and (b) when a country regulates its fishermen to conserve that resource and (c) where that resource is already fully utilized on a sustained yield basis. If two of the parties have thus investigated, regulated, and utilized a fishery, the third party should waive its rights.

9. This principle was hedged by exceptions. (1) No party should waive its right if it has been or is exploiting that fishery on a substantial scale or (2) No party should waive a right to any resource in the high seas contiguous to its territorial waters or to a fishery harvested by some country not party to the treaty.

10. The United States draft also contained machinery for studying and carrying out the application of these principles through the establishment of a Commission on which the three governments would be represented. Other clauses related to enforcement and the like.

11. In the initial discussions with the United States Government, Canada indicated that these principles gave her insufficient protection. Canadian fishermen had not established fishing operations to any extent along the Alaskan coast or along the coast of the United States proper. The application of these principles in the future might put Canada in the position of being asked to waive her right to fish salmon or other resources in these waters. The United States fishermen, however, have historically fished the British Columbia coast and could not be asked to waive rights anywhere from the Behring Sea southwards. Canada also felt that her relations with the United States in these waters were unique but that the three-way treaty being proposed by the United States could, if it had the powers of excluding Japan from the certain fisheries, contain also the power to exclude Canada.

12. A further exception, therefore, was put in the United States draft at our insistence. It provided that because of inter-mingling of fishing stocks, operations and joint regulation programmes, neither Canada nor the United States would be asked to waive fishing rights in the high seas contiguous to the coasts of Canada and the United States, from and including the Gulf of Alaska southwards. In short, no matter where the principles applied, only in the Behring Sea could Canada be asked to abstain from fishing.

13. This clause was embarrassing to the United States from the beginning because in effect it said while we were both subscribing to these principles, we were making an exception in their application down our whole coasts from the Gulf of Alaska to the south. This clause was to prove difficult in the negotiations with the Japanese, since they interpreted the United States draft principles as restricting only Japan, with Canada and the United States being exempt under this clause.

14. Canada, however, had to insist on its insertion. Canada, making a bilateral treaty with the United States alone on fisheries, would not have accepted a treaty with such principles. The exception mentioned above had therefore to be added to prevent these principles being enforced against Canada, and to leave Canadian-American relations unchanged in the whole fishery from the Gulf of Alaska southwards. By reason of this exception, the door could still be left open for a later fisheries treaty of any type between the United States and Canada.

15. The proposed treaty and the principles embodied in the United States draft were referred to Cabinet for approval before the Canadian delegation proceeded to Japan.

General Features of Tokyo Conference

16. After the opening plenary session the conference resolved itself into two Committees, a Committee on Principles and Drafting and a Committee on Biology.

17. The latter Committee did not meet for some time because the head of the United States delegation felt that the biological questions should not be discussed with the Japanese until there was agreement on principles. We disagreed with this view. We felt that meetings of the biologists of the three countries would acquaint each with the general and particular biological problems of the North Pacific, that they would provide the men who might later be servicing the proposed International Commission with chances for exchanging views and ideas, and that the biological discussions on the fishery resources themselves and their relation to principles, would help to allay Japanese fears as to the extent of exclusion the United States and ourselves had in mind. The mill of negotiations must have grist: the conference could not grind out a treaty so long as the Japanese were unaware of the species from which they might be excluded: until then, the principles were a mill without grist.

18. These views were not, however, acceptable to the United States and they were able to defer the meeting of the Biological Committee until the fourth week of the conference. This contributed to delay because the final, and one of the most difficult, questions of the whole conference was a biological one. After the treaty was drafted and ready for signing — with the exception of the Annex — the Biological Committee was still at work on the Behring Sea problem (discussed later).

19. The Committee on Principles and Drafting met daily, the chairman alternating between the three countries. It took some three weeks to reach agreement on general principles. Thereafter, this Committee, which had been a committee of the whole, was replaced by a small drafting committee of three from each country. Throughout the proceedings of all committees, translations had to be made and this, too, contributed to the lengthy negotiations.

United States Position and Actions

20. The United States draft was in itself a compromise of many American views — views of the fishing industry, views of the Fish and Wildlife Service, and divergent views within the State Department itself. In Washington in May we met the United States State Department when it had four distinct views within it: one from the international lawyers, another from the economists, a third from the Far Eastern Division and a fourth from the Fisheries Section.[22] Within itself therefore, the United States had had a problem in reconciling views, and the United States draft treaty contained quite a delicate adjustment of these. Consequently, at the Conference, the head of the United States delegation had little room to manoeuver.

21. This circumstance quite frequently affected the American attitude at the conference. Occasionally it appeared as if the United States intended to force its document on the Japanese. Because of the Occupation, the fact that the Peace Treaty was not yet ratified in the United States, and because the head of the delegation had spent four years in Japan and was aware of the weaknesses in Japan's own conservation programmes, the United States delegation at times resorted to what might be described as more than peaceful persuasion of the Japanese. This had an effect on the Japanese delegation itself; their Fisheries Division was apt to resist this type of pressure and to discuss the treaty on its own merits, while their Foreign Office representative was constantly mindful of the United States. He in turn would exert pressure on Fujita, the Director of Fisheries. During negotiations if some particular point seemed difficult to reach agreement on, the threat that the United States would go to Premier Yoshida for a decision was implicit. On two occasions it was explicit and on one occasion was actually exercised. We feared that this type of pressure would enable Fujita and the Japanese fishing industry to state in the future that they had not accepted the particular point and that it had only been forced on them in the conference by external American Government pressure.

22. On the first day of the conference we discussed with the head of the United States Delegation the method of presenting his draft. We recommended that the draft, as a draft, should not be shown and that in the beginning only the clause covering the principles and the exceptions should be presented to the conference. Following such a discussion on principles we thought the other parts of the draft might be brought out piece by piece as the conference progressed. The head of the United States delegation differed from this view and declared that he intended to present the whole draft to the conference on the day following the plenary session. These meetings were in camera and he was anxious that the Japanese industrial advisers who were present should see the draft as a whole. This course was followed. Unfortunately, on the day after its presentation, the United States draft was published in full in a Hokkaido newspaper. This leak produced rudeness from the Americans and embarrassment on the part of the Japanese. The United States ability to manoeuver was reduced still further, since their proposals now became a matter of comment in the public press.

23. The Japanese embarrassment, however, extended beyond the copyroom of the Foreign Office. They felt it incumbent on them now to prepare a Japanese draft.† This Fisheries Conference, it will be recalled, was the first that the Japanese had attended for many years, and to justify their position they felt it necessary, now that the United States draft was in the press, to have a quite distinctive and different Japanese draft. Accordingly, the first week of sessions at the Committee on Principles was devoted to discussions of the United States draft, the second to the presentation and study of the Japanese draft and the third to the attempt to reconcile or harmonize these. In passing it may be said at this point that the Japanese proposals were based on the principles underlying the International Whaling Convention — that is, a respect for conservation laws and procedures but with no exclusion of any country from the exercise of its right to fish the particular resource under these conservation laws.

24. Another condition that led to delay and misunderstanding came through the offer of the head of the United States delegation to explain the United States draft. The document itself was quite explicit. It had already been cleared with the various branches in the United States, including the legal officers. Mr. Herrington's explanations tended to confuse rather than elucidate its principles and exceptions. The Japanese seemed to think Herrington was being evasive, and this led them to very close questioning of the United States draft — Fujita showing excellent insight into the problem during the course of the proceedings. One example of this confusion will suffice. In Article VII of the American draft there was a provision that the Commission shall "study any fisheries resource specified in the Annex for the purpose of determining annually whether such resource continues to qualify for waiver or whether wider access under effective conservation arrangements can be developed". In explaining this provision, Herrington said that the word "or" meant "and if so". We insisted that it meant "and if not". The Japanese seized upon the American interpretation since it might permit them entry into fisheries that would otherwise be closed, and it was only through long argument that the Americans could be extricated from this wrongful interpretation of their own draft.

25. Another point of interest to us was the character of the American delegation itself. The whole group, both officials and advisers, was different in personnel from that which had negotiated the North West Atlantic Fisheries Treaty two years earlier. The Japanese, however, made frequent references to the Atlantic Treaty and in some particulars would have liked the Pacific Treaty to be similar in nature. No member of the American team, however, was familiar with the Atlantic Treaty, and therefore able to explain its clauses and the rationale and raison d'être of each.

26. The composition of the United States delegation seemed to have been poured from an unusual mould. Unlike the other two delegations it had no parliamentary representatives. It was heavily weighted with industry advisers. It had no senior representation from SCAP or the American Embassy in Tokyo. It seemed an incomplete team, and its nature was a little mystifying to the Japanese from the beginning.

27. Perhaps fish merchants are apt to be rough. They certainly created the impression among the Japanese that they intended to get something in the fisheries treaty they thought they should have had in the Peace Treaty itself — namely a complete exclusion of the Japanese from the Eastern Pacific. The Japanese delegation began to fear that the Security Treaty was only the first of a series of American pressures on them that would eventually produce a group of treaties which, taken together, might prove to be the equivalent of a Carthaginian peace.

28. Because of this the Japanese delegation gradually looked more and more to the Canadian delegation to be fair and impartial. On two occasions the head of the Japanese delegation came to our Embassy much disturbed over American-Japanese differences and asked us to use our good offices in finding a reconciliation, without which they threatened to withdraw completely from the negotiations. Our delegation was in an unusually difficult position and the role of mediator was not easy to play. We had made definite commitments to the United States before leaving for Japan. We had too insisted on the insertion of a clause in the treaty that for the most part excluded us from the application of its principles. Our own failure to subscribe completely to the principles made it difficult for us to persuade the Japanese to accept them and our previous commitment to the Americans made it equally difficult for us to persuade them to abandon them.

Japanese Position and Attitudes

29. The Supreme Commander had indicated "that the Japanese delegation will negotiate and conclude the said international convention on the basis that the Government of Japan possesses ad hoc sovereign equality with the governments of Canada and the United States". With the Occupation, the Security Pact, the unratified Peace Treaty, with the nation "moulting, sick, in the dreadful wind of change", this declaration — meant to be magnanimous — merely pointed up the underlying weakness of the Japanese bargaining position. In the negotiations the Japanese delegation often revealed their doubts on their bargaining position with the United States. The United States delegation was quite content to leave this doubt in the Japanese minds, and as mentioned earlier, occasionally to confirm the doubts by referring to the possibility of going to a higher authority for a decision on some knotty point.

30. From time to time therefore the Japanese delegation seemed to be testing the limits of United States' resistance to Japanese interests. To some extent this was being done for interests beyond fisheries. Attached to the Japanese delegation but unnamed, was a group of post-war diplomats who were having their initial experiences in international negotiations. This group of onlookers swelled in numbers on each occasion in which there were differences between Canada and the United States. Mr. Tsuchiya of the Foreign Office confided their interest in Canadian-American relations, in watching how the Canadians handled themselves in the face of American opposition, how they resisted United States pressures, and sought to effect United States compromises. Tsuchiya mentioned that after ratification of the Peace Treaty, Japan under its Security Pact with the United States, feels that her relations with the great power may be in some respects like those of Canada. Hence the interest of the Foreign Office in watching every move made between Canadians and Americans.

31. Another circumstance affected the whole Japanese thinking on this treaty. For the immediate future, their most important relations in fisheries are likely to be with Asiatic countries, with Russia and China, with Korea, with Indonesia, Australia, all of whom desire a rigorous exclusion of Japanese fishing vessels from their adjacent seas. The Japanese had therefore to test the principles of the United States draft and its exceptions against all of these possible Asiatic relations, to ensure that no part of this treaty — in principles, in exceptions, in enforcement regulations or in the Commission structure — could possibly be used as a precedent against them in treaties with any of these other countries.

32. The current attempt to codify Japanese laws in general added to this problem. Since this treaty will become Japanese law, any of its clauses might become part of a code that they would have to apply to other fisheries treaties.

33. The condition mentioned in the previous paragraphs produced another result which in turn had features of its own. While there was a constant problem of getting accurate translations between the English language and Japanese, the Japanese delegation were obviously aiming at imprecision in the final wording of clauses. This was being done purposely so that they could later interpret the treaty and its terms with some degree of latitude. On one point on which there was a sharp difference between the Japanese and the Canadians, they suggested we leave the English text in a way that would suit us while they would make the Japanese text conform to their own wishes! This honest dishonesty prevented our congratulating ourselves on our moral superiority but led us to insist that no clause in the treaty should read in opposite ways in the different languages. The incident added zeal to the efforts of the Americans and ourselves to see that language and translation would be as precise as possible. The senior translator at the Canadian Legation, Mr. Iwamoto, was very helpful in this particular.

34. This kind of thing, and the subsequent struggle for unanimity of understanding and identity of language in the two texts helps to explain the protracted negotiations.

35. As we moved into the Sub-Committee on Drafting after there had been general agreement on principle, we found that each article was treated, not so much as a part of the final draft, but as an entity in itself. Indeed, the whole treaty, it might be said, was reviewed in each clause. Matters of principle that we thought were settled weeks before would come up again and again for new consideration or for qualification. They would dwell so long on a single article that we feared it would take them prisoner. But not so. Each clause gave them another chance to question the principles of the treaty itself, to argue for the inalienable right of free fishing on an equal footing with all on the high seas, to battle the Canada-United States principles that would result in their exclusion from certain fisheries. They knew, as Charles James Fox said, that the same reason dished out in ten different forms was as effective in debate as ten different reasons. Each article in the Treaty therefore allowed them to revive the one idea — the right of free and equal exploitation of fisheries everywhere. In consequence their arguments were frequently free of the trammels of logic! Their argument often presupposed that reason never controls human affairs: the United States draft presumed that it always does.

36. In this atmosphere, it became a matter of outlasting them in negotiations. One of the Japanese industrial advisers warned me early in the meetings that it had taken Mr. Fujita many months to complete his negotiations with the Russians in Moscow before the war. He went on to say that following our treaty the Indonesians would be in Tokyo. I asked when the Indonesian negotiations started and was told that it would be December 17th. Our treaty was concluded on December 14th and I think negotiations had lasted by then just as long as the Japanese had wished.

37. One feature that may be worthy of note was the frequent discussions between the Japanese delegation and the Fisheries Committee of the Diet. All questions of principle had to be cleared by Fujita with the Committee during the course of the conference — a point that might indicate a growth of more democratic procedures, and new strength of the elected representatives as against bureaucrats.[23] Coupled with this was Fujita's occasional concern as to how he could explain away some compromise being suggested to him, and on more than one occasion he specially asked for the advice of the other delegations as to how he could interpret the particularly difficult point to the Diet.

38. For quite other reasons, it should be noted too that when the conference opened, the Chairman of the Fisheries Committee in the House of Councillors and the Chairman of the Fisheries Committee in the House of Representatives were both numbered among the advisers to the Japanese delegation. At one point in the negotiations, when the Japanese delegation conceded their willingness to abstain from the exercise of fishing rights in the Eastern Pacific, these elected representatives dissociated themselves from the subsequent proceedings. This was done without fuss and at the time we were inclined to interpret this action as having only local political significance — in the sense that neither of these chairmen would wish to have their names associated with a treaty in which Japan waived its rights

[23] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Or else the Japanese have learned U.S. obstructing tactics. C.S.A.R[itchie] to fish. Another set of later events may, however, give this action a different significance.

39. The Japanese wished to have a treaty of only five years duration, the Americans wished fifteen and a compromise was made at ten. During private discussions with one of the Japanese industrialists, he mentioned that for the next five years Japan would not wish to fish our side of the Pacific, since she had to build up her long-distance fishing fleet and since these would, in the interim, likely be going only as far as the Behring Sea anyway. The nature of the remarks, and the manner of their making, left a hint that we might, at the expiration of the treaty, have to face the whole issue anew.

40. Still other factors add to this impression. Japan agreed to abstain from fishing salmon, halibut and herring in the Eastern Pacific. Under the same principles she could have asked Canada and the United States to abstain from fishing some species around her coasts. She refused however to ask for such abstention on our part. In private we quietly pressed for some explanation of her attitude but none was forthcoming. Thus Japan has subscribed to the principles but has refused to apply them in her own interest. She thereby makes it patent that the treaty is for the sole advantage of Canada and the United States of America. Is she thereby following a course that will permit her to say later she subscribed only under duress of the Occupation and the unratified Peace Treaty, and that since she did not apply the treaty in her own interest, she will be free, in the eyes of the world, to abrogate it at the end of the treaty period?

41. Two other later events might be mentioned. The Honourable Mr. Nemoto who signed the treaty was dismissed from the Cabinet within a week of its signing. We believed this was due to his rice policy which had been under criticism in the Diet. Since returning to Canada, Mr. Narita, the Japanese representative in Ottawa, informed me within forty-eight hours of its happening, that Mr. Fujita had been dismissed from the service. He was the Director of Fisheries, one of the most senior of all civil servants in Japan, in our view the ablest man at the conference, with a keen legal mind and a deep insight into all the international fisheries relations of his country. His dismissal seems to fit into the above pattern of incidents.

42. Their self-interest prompted the Japanese to be vague in the declaration of principles, to be flexible in the model of the Commission, to be loose in treaty language, to hide and not reveal true intent. These things they were unable to achieve. But the above pattern of incidents, the action and reaction within Japan, may hint what broods in the deep recesses of the official Japanese imagination. Perhaps the treaty may prove to be, in A.N. Whitehead's phrase "nothing but an average stability of certain events in a set of agitations".

The Issues Before the Conference

43. The main questions are covered in a separate memorandum† attached hereto and prepared by S.V. Ozere, the Legal Adviser to the delegation. That part of this report gives article by article a summary of the issues, and the reasons for the articles taking the particular form they have.

44. One part of the treaty — the Annex and the Protocol — is not referred to in the attached notes and some comment here is necessary.

45. The Annex lists the particular species that Japan has agreed to abstain from fishing, and that we and the United States have agreed to continue to conserve. Annex, paragraph 2 refers to the Behring Sea question, as does also the Protocol.

46. The Behring Sea issue did not come up until the whole treaty had been drafted. As the conference was drawing to a close, it suddenly became confronted with a major question — namely the intermingling of salmon stocks in the Behring Sea, the stocks going to Asia and to North America respectively. The winds of the Behring Sea did not, however, ventilate our brains on this issue. It was late. There was fear of the unknowns on the part of both the Americans and the Japanese. The Japanese knew the fishery in the area more intimately than anyone else and knew much about the intermingling of the stocks. With the loss of their fisheries in Kamchatka, with the Russians imprisoning any Japanese fishermen found anywhere up to fifty miles off their coasts, the Japanese wanted a substantial area in the Behring Sea to fish for the Asiatic-bound salmon. Neither we nor the Americans knew anything of the migratory routes or of the intermingling of the Asiatic and Alaskan salmon in the Behring Sea. The Americans wished to hold the Japanese off as far as possible from Alaska to ensure that they would not trap the runs of red salmon going to Bristol Bay. A compromise was needed and it had to be geographical, a corridor, a zone or a line.

47. We pleaded for a corridor, an area of no-fishing in the middle of the Behring Sea where the stocks intermingle, with the Japanese fishing on the left of the corridor, taking salmon as they headed out for Asia, and the Americans on the right taking salmon as they headed out for Alaska. In the end the conference did what it had set out not to do. It drew a line, the line specified in Annex, paragraph 2. (See official printed report of Tripartite Fisheries Conference, Pages 103-4 for Canadian Delegation's comment on the compromise.) The line sets out an area roughly from Alaska to 175°W longitude in which both Canada and Japan have agreed to abstain from fishing salmon.

48. The Japanese had argued cogently that if a line to be drawn it should be at 170°W This the Americans would not accept and the final compromise pleased neither. Nor did it please the United States State Department in Washington. In the last hours of the conference Herrington had to make several phone calls to Washington as they sought some other solution. His delegation of industrial advisers had all returned to the United States and some of them, too, had to be phoned. Only at noon on the day of the signing of the final document did he receive final consent from the State Department — with their non-committal statement that they would sanction the line if it were approved by Mr. Sebald, the United States Political Adviser in Japan. He did approve and Herrington was able to be present for the signing at 4 P.M.

49. Because all three parties disliked the idea of any geographical zone, a protocol was added to the treaty to draw attention to the unique nature of this problem. It was agreed that the line should be only provisional, and the protocol instructs the Commission to put priority on the study of the intermingling of stocks in that area and to recommend other appropriate action to the governments. Should the commission fail to make a recommendation, the matter may be referred to a special committee of three disinterested persons, no one of whom shall be a National of a contracting party, for the determination of the matter.

50. This final solution was satisfactory to us. Under the terms of the treaty we had to abstain from fishing salmon in the Behring Sea although other species may be taken if our fishermen wish to go so far afield. The study of the intermingling may well prove, however, that there is interconnection between salmon stocks in the Gulf of Alaska and in the Behring Sea. If this is so proven, the United States can no longer ask us to abstain from salmon fishing in the Behring Sea itself. (See Article IV Proviso No. 3.)

Treaty Procedure

51. It will be noted that at the final plenary session the heads of the delegations did not sign the draft convention itself. They signed only the Resolutions and Requests. One of these resolutions is a recommendation to the governments that the draft convention be considered and approved by them. When this is done the Convention will be signed in Tokyo.

52. This arrangement was made because the Japanese Peace Treaty has not yet been ratified and Japan is unable to sign a draft fisheries convention until her sovereignty is restored. The necessary ratification of the Peace Treaty is not simply by Canada and the United States but by the majority of the signatory countries. The draft fisheries convention need not, therefore, come before the Canadian Parliament in the spring of 1952 since the Peace Treaty is unlikely to be ratified until later in the year.[24]

BRAZIL: COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH CANADA

Present Canadian trade policy towards Brazil is governed by the GATT, to which both countries subscribe. We exchange most favoured nation treatment under our trade agreement of October 17, 1941. Due to shortage of dollar exchange, Brazil has a quite strict import control directed against all hard currency countries.

Brazilian import controls have latterly had a drastic curtailing effect on their imports of Canadian codfish. We have been trying to have them accept some Newfoundland codfish, to which they indicated their willingness on the condition that we make newsprint available to them.

The Economic Division of this Department and the Department of Trade and Commerce are desirous of keeping the Government out of this transaction, and are satisfied that the private entities are making slow but satisfactory progress. The firms involved are: for codfish, NAFEL (Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters Limited) through their Brazilian agents and other importers; and for newsprint, Bowaters Limited. No action is needed, and our Embassy in Rio has promised to keep us informed of developments.

Resulting from the problems raised at the time of these negotiations it was decided to ask the International Trade Relations Division of the Department of Trade & Commerce to make a general investigation of Canadian-Brazilian trade relations. Their summary, dated July 1951, is attached. It covers general factors, and on Page 7 reviews the history of the codfish negotiations.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], July, 1951

SUMMARY OF INFORMATION ON CANADIAN - BRAZILIAN TRADE RELATIONS

1. Canadian Trade with Brazil

Canadian Exports

In the four years 1945-1948, Brazil was Canada's largest market in Latin America, taking over $101 million worth of goods out of total Canadian exports of $404 million to all Latin America in the same period. Canadian exports to Brazil during this period included: wheat flour, codfish, woodpulps, newsprint, farm machinery, sewing machines, aluminum, copper, asbestos, electrical equipment, chemicals and a host of consumer goods.

In July 1949, Brazil initiated strict import restrictions in trade with the hard currency area. A wide range of Canadian products has been affected thereby, and Canadian exports to Brazil have declined sharply from their peak 1947 levels. Brazilian import restrictions are still in effect, although they have been relaxed since Korea in the case of items in short supply.

Canadian Exports to Brazil

(In million Canadian dollars. DBS statistics)

1947	1948	1949	1950	4 months 1950	4 months 1951
31.6	28.6	17.2	15.8	2.9	8.6

Many of the Canadian products that have been affected by Brazilian import restrictions are items considered non-essential by the Brazilian authorities, such as: whiskey, apples, radios and refrigerators. Others are non-continuing items such as ships, which added over $8 million to our export figures in 1947 and again in 1948.

However, several Canadian items of a more essential nature, and traditional to our trade, have been seriously affected. The following are the main products under this heading:

Codfish, wheat flour, wood pulp, sewing machines, newsprint (until the Korean war).

The only important categories of Canadian exports to Brazil that have not experienced a general decline are: farm machinery and electrical equipment.

Canadian Imports

Imports into Canada from Brazil consist mainly of coffee (over 60% in value), followed by cocoa, nuts, sisal, waxes, oils. Due principally to the increased value of coffee, Canadian imports from Brazil have been rising in value as our exports to Brazil declined:

13.8	20.5	21.1	28.2	7.1	12.7

Balance of Payments

Brazil's unfavourable balance of trade with Canada in the immediate postwar period turned into a clearly favourable balance after 1949 as a result of Brazil's import controls and of rising prices for coffee.

Balance of Trade

(In million Canadian dollars. DBS statistics)

	1947	1948	1949	1950	4 months 1950	4 months 1951
Canadian Imports from Brazil	13.8	20.5	21.1	28.2	7.1	12.7
Canadian Exports to Brazil	31.6	28.6	17.2	15.8	2.9	8.6
Brazil's Trade Balance	–17.8	–8.1	+3.9	+12.4	+3.2	+4.1

Brazil's favourable trade balance with Canada is even more satisfactory than appears from the statistics when account is taken of the substantial imports of electrical and other equipment from Canada, paid for by Brazilian Traction out of I.B.R.D. loans and not from current trade receipts. In January 1949 the I.B.R.D. extended Brazilian Traction a loan of U.S. $72.4 million, of which the equivalent of U.S. $40.5 million had been drawn by October 1950. Of this amount, several million dollars were in all probability spent by the Company on Canadian electrical and other equipment.

On the other hand, Brazil's balance of payments with Canada includes a continuing deficit item of about $14 million (Canadian funds) released each year by Brazil for the payment of Brazilian Traction dividends. Not even at their high point in 1950 were her earnings from trade with Canada sufficient to meet this item.

2. Improvement in Brazil's General Position

Present Position

The decline in Canadian exports to Brazil has been paralleled by a sharp fall in U.S. exports to Brazil after 1949. This trend has been the result of three main factors:

(i) Brazilian import restrictions against hand-currency goods, originally imposed to compensate for the heavy post-war drain of exchange and the accumulation of commercial arrears.

(ii) Renewed overseas competition, from the U.K., Belgium, Norway and W. Germany, by means of bilateral trade agreements and barter transactions.

(iii) Rapidly increasing industrialization in Brazil itself (i.e.: wheat flour, paper, rubber tires, iron and steel manufactures, pharmaceuticals, textiles, cement). For example, Brazilian steel production in 1950 is estimated to have saved Brazil over US$ 40 million in foreign exchange, which would have had to be spent on imported steel.

As a result of these factors and of high world prices especially for coffee, but also for cotton, cocoa, carnauba wax and tobacco, Brazil's overall dollar balance has shown a marked improvement. This improvement has been accentuated by events following the outbreak of the Korean war.

Rising export earnings in 1950 went largely to clear up commercial backlogs which stood at US$ 226 million in October 1949. In 1951, a major part of foreign exchange earnings will be used to reduce a large backlog of frozen remittances on foreign investments.

Thus, although Brazil's trade balance on dollar account has been running a surplus of over $250 million (average) in 1949 and in 1950, holdings of gold and foreign exchange are up much less than the trade balance.

Bank of Brazil foreign exchange assets which stood at U.S. $402 million in December 1949, had fallen to U.S. $270 million by June 1950 and have been rising to $391 million by March 1951. Gold assets have similarly risen from a low point of U.S. $586 million in June 1950 to U.S. $708 million in March 1951.

Short-run Prospects

In the immediate future a narrowing of Brazil's trade surplus with the dollar area may be expected. This would follow from increased imports of essential materials and machinery for stockpiling purposes (imports from the U.S. this year are up almost 40 per cent from the 1950 rate). Although coffee prices are expected to remain high and coffee exports have risen from last year's record rate of $60 million a month to $85 million a month in 1951, there are reports showing that U.S. imports of coffee have been running ahead of consumption so that stocks are piling up.

But with her commercial debts and her financial arrears liquidated, and with import restrictions on non-essentials still in effect, Brazil will probably continue to finance her increased dollar imports without difficulty. Brazil may be expected, therefore, to increase her level of dollar expenditures. On the other hand, in their desire to obtain adequate supplies of scarce materials, the Brazilians may be expected to maintain strict import controls on non-essential dollar products, this latter with strong protectionist overtones.

Long-term Prospects

Brazil, with a population of over 52 million, is already the most highly industrialized and one of the most rapidly developing countries in Latin America. Sao Paulo, for example, is today the world's fastest growing city.

Present restrictive policies, coupled with high world prices for coffee and other Brazilian products, have contributed to the improvement of Brazil's balance of payments position. A more fundamental long-term factor in strengthening Brazil's economy is the growth of new industries in Brazil and the exploitation of as yet undeveloped mineral resources.

In the long run, Brazil could well become the most important expanding market in Latin America, and one based on an increasingly stable and diversified economy.

The increased industrialization of Brazil may cause a shift in the traditional composition of Canadian exports to that market, but it is possible that future exports will be at even higher levels than in the past.

3. Canadian Trade Policy Towards Brazil

Present Canadian trade policy towards Brazil is governed by the GATT, to which both countries subscribe. Canada and Brazil exchange most-favoured-nation treatment in all tariff and trade matters under the Trade Agreement between the two countries dated October 17, 1941.[1] Canada and Brazil are both bound under the GATT to non-discriminatory application of import restrictions.

Brazil's import restrictions conform to the balance of payments escape clauses of the GATT since they are directed against all hard-currency countries and not against Canadian products as such.

The Department of Trade and Commerce has facilitated private compensation or barter transactions undertaken by Canadian firms. Such private barter transactions have been carried out by Canadian codfish exporters, for example. The difficulties inherent in such complicated dealings have been made even greater by the Brazilian Government's limitations on the range of products available for barter. Only "surplus products", difficult to sell in the dollar markets, have been permitted for barter by Brazil. Under new Brazilian regulations, only those barter transactions approved before February 1951 are now permitted, thus practically eliminating any possibility of arranging further private barter deals for the present.

The suitability of our present trade policy to deal with the serious situation for our exports in Brazil, was questioned by the Canadian Ambassador, Mr. J. Scott Macdonald, in his report of April 3, 1950 and again in November 1950. In these reports, the Ambassador urged that the advisability of entering into a bilateral trade agreement with Brazil be seriously considered.

Following a detailed study of the various measures that could be taken by Canada, (see: ISCETP Document No. 51-3, circulated to all Trade Commissioners under Circular Letter M1725),† the Canadian Ambassador was advised as follows:

> "A bilateral agreement with Brazil would appear to be neither desirable nor feasible under present conditions. It would represent a major change in Canadian trade policy, requiring the imposition of discriminatory trade controls in contravention of GATT, and would react unfavourably on Canada's commercial relations with other countries.
> "Measures of a retaliatory nature whether under GATT or outside GATT, are strictly limited in number, and would likely cause more harm than good for our total trade. Such measures should be employed only as a last resort.
> "In view of Canada's strong economic position at present, and of Brazil's improving exchange position, it would appear advisable to adopt a policy of continued pressure for the easing of restrictions against those dollar goods of particular importance to us and traditional for the Brazilian market.

"Such pressure could stress the undertaking under GATT, Article XII 3(c)(iii), "to apply restrictions (to safeguard the balance of payments) in such a way as to avoid unnecessary damage to the commercial or economic interests of any other contracting party". Emphasis should also be placed on Brazil's increasingly favourable exchange position.

"The next meeting of the GATT Contracting Parties in September 1951, could provide an opportunity for a thorough review of Brazil's import restrictions and of her exchange reserves. In the light of this review, the justification or otherwise of continued import restrictions by Brazil will become clear."

4. Codfish Exports to Brazil

(i) Brazil (in particular Northern Brazil) has long been one of the most important traditional markets for Newfoundland salt codfish.

Prewar exports of Newfoundland cod to Brazil ranged between 25 and 31 million pounds. In 1948 exports amounted to about 13 million pounds (almost $2 million), representing 33 per cent of Brazil's total imports of cod in that year.

In 1949, as part of its stringent import restrictions, Brazil imposed a complete ban on dollar imports of codfish. This ban is still in effect, and since that time only small quantities of Canadian fish have been exported on a private barter basis. In 1950, only about 250 thousand pounds of codfish were permitted entry into Brazil from Newfoundland, roughly 0.5 per cent of all Brazilian imports of cod in that year.

(ii) Norway has now become Brazil's chief supplier of codfish, providing nearly three-quarters of the total quantity imported in 1950. Exports of Norwegian codfish to Brazil rose from 16 million pounds in 1947 to 30 million pounds in 1949. Norwegian supplies are entering under a long-term barter arrangement which provides for the direct exchange of codfish for Brazilian coffee. Similar facilities for the exchange of coffee have been denied Canadian codfish exporters, on the grounds that only inferior grades of coffee, unsuitable for the dollar market, were being allowed in the barter arrangement with Norway.

(iii) In December 1949, the Canadian Ambassador to Brazil made formal representations to the Brazilian Government with respect to the urgency of securing import quotas for Canadian codfish and sewing-machines.

In November 1950, the Canadian Ambassador was asked to make the "strongest representations" to the Brazilian government to re-open the Brazilian salt fish market to Canadian exporters.

In February, 1951, Mr. Howe gave the Brazilian Ambassador to Canada a memorandum strongly urging the relaxation of import controls on codfish. This memorandum noted the substantial improvement in Brazil's dollar position, recalled the provisions of the GATT under which "unnecessary damage to the commercial interests" of another country were to be avoided in the application of import restrictions, referred to the fact that coffee had been made available for barter with Norwegian exporters but not to Canadian firms, and outlined the importance of Canada's traditional interest in the Brazilian salt fish market.

In May 1951 the Brazilian authorities convened a conference with Canadian representatives in Rio for a full discussion of the problem. After prolonged discussion, the Brazilians said they would be prepared to sanction the import of codfish only if (a) specified quantities of newsprint, aluminum and tinplate were also made available by Canada, or (b) if Canada would increase her imports of surplus Brazilian products, such as rice, oranges, nuts.

In reply to these proposals, it was again pointed out that the Canadian Government is not in a position to enter into commitments as to products which are subject to private business control. However, at the request of Mr. Howe, the Newfoundland Provincial Government would attempt to have the Bowater's Pulp and Paper Mills make available additional supplies of newsprint for Brazil, in order to encourage that country to purchase supplies of cod from Newfoundland.

Preliminary reports lead to the hope that some 5,000 tons of newsprint may be made available for Brazil in 1951 under this arrangement, which would permit the entry into Brazil of codfish to the value of approximately 1/2 million dollars this year.

5. Conclusions

(1) Brazil has traditionally been an important market for Canadian codfish, wheat flour, newsprint and a wide range of other products, many of which have been kept out of Brazil since 1949 due to strict dollar-saving import restrictions.

(2) Brazil's import restrictions are legitimate under GATT and do not discriminate against Canadian products as such, as compared with other hard currency products. They have undoubtedly contributed to Brazil's greatly improved balance of payments position.

(3) From the long-term point of view, Brazil, as the largest and most rapidly developing country in Latin America, should again become the most attractive market in that area.

(4) Unless there is evidence to the contrary, Brazil's present restrictive policy must be regarded as a necessary temporary step in rehabilitating the Brazilian foreign payments position for the future. As long as no new problems develop, the objective for Canada should be to maintain as firm a foothold as possible in the Brazilian market, in anticipation of the day when Brazil will again become Canada's best customer in Latin America.

(5) With respect to codfish, in particular, we have strong grounds for continuing to press for a lifting of import restrictions by Brazil.

CUBA AND EMPIRE PREFERENCE ON SUGAR; TORQUAY TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS

This matter was discussed today in the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy. Mr. Abbott will probably raise it in Cabinet tomorrow.

2. Some three weeks ago Mr. Hector McKinnon reported from Torquay to Mr. Abbott that the Cubans were demanding elimination or at least some reduction in our Empire preference on sugar. This preference of approximately a cent a pound means that virtually all Canadian imported sugar comes from Empire sources and the great bulk of it from the British West Indies.

3. The question was reviewed by officials who concluded that the cent-a-pound preference had little economic advantage for Canada. Canadians were paying an extra cent for their sugar; on the other hand the advantages which Canada had obtained in exchange for the preference — advantages for Canadian exports in the West Indies and other Empire markets — had been largely wiped out by the dollar-saving import restrictions of the sterling area. On the other hand Canada cannot reduce the preference without getting the concurrence of the Empire countries concerned who would certainly raise objections. The United Kingdom has been faced with grave economic and political difficulties in the British West Indies in recent years. The Canadian preference is working in a way that helps the United Kingdom to ensure steady sales of West India sugar in Canada at prices nearly one cent above the Cuban price. West Indian production is likely to remain relatively inefficient and the extra cent is considered valuable.

4. Accordingly Mr. Abbott sent instructions back to McKinnon to say that Canada was not willing to open the whole question of Empire preference on sugar at this time. It was pointed out that the Torquay negotiations were drawing to a close. The hope was held out that we would be willing to bargain on a broader basis at a later date.

5. However, the Cubans have refused to take no for an answer and they have considerable reason on their side. They might claim that Canada was refusing to bargain in good faith under the GATT in which all members are bound to pursue the objective of lowered tariffs and preferences. They have asked us for sugar concessions before and have been refused. They can point out that the sugar policy of the United Kingdom is designed not merely to maintain but actually to expand sugar production in relatively inefficient places, including the British West Indies, and this in competition with the relatively efficient Cuban operations.

6. Accordingly the Cubans have now warned that if we continue to refuse to negotiate on sugar they will consider withdrawing tariff concessions that they made in Canada's favour at Geneva four years ago. Unfortunately they made concessions to us on at least two items which are politically vulnerable in this country: codfish and seed potatoes.

7. Of course we might hit back. Their exports of products such as pineapple to us are politically sensitive in Cuba. On the other hand it would be a most unhappy situation if, when the general results of the Torquay negotiations were brought into Parliament later this session, the most spectacular result was active trade warfare between Cuba and ourselves at the particular expense of exporters in our Maritime Provinces.

8. At the Interdepartmental Committee it was generally agreed:

(a) We should not simply stand pat on our refusal to negotiate the sugar preference.

(b) The matter should be explored further both with the Cubans and also with the United Kingdom. At some stage a three-cornered discussion might prove necessary.

(c) Possible Canadian concessions might be:

(i) A moderate reduction of the Empire preference, i.e. a reduction in the M.F.N. rate while the Empire rate remained the same. The chief effect of this would be that the United Kingdom and/or the West Indies would get a slightly lower price for sugar sold to Canada; at present they sell at the Cuban price plus almost the whole of the one-cent preference. Thus the long term subsidy to high cost sugar areas would be reduced. On the other hand the Cubans would not sell any sugar to Canada in the immediate future so it is doubtful whether they would accept this offer.

(ii) A bulk purchase of non-Empire sugar (from Cuba and other sources). The purchase would cover a certain quantity of Canadian imports — say 100,000 tons out of our current imports of 600,000 tons. Surprisingly enough this would not damage the United Kingdom or the West Indies to the extent that would appear at first sight. The Commonwealth and Empire are not self-sufficient in sugar. The United Kingdom is already buying several hundred thousand tons of Cuban sugar (and is negotiating a long term contract with Cuba at present). If Canada buys less sugar from the West Indies and more from Cuba the United Kingdom will presumably buy more from the former and less from the latter. Hence the need for three-cornered discussions mentioned above.

(iii) A variant of (ii) would be to allow a certain quota of non-Empire sugars — say 100,000 tons — to come into Canada at Empire preference rates. It was the opinion of the Interdepartmental Committee that this device was rather less clean-cut and less certain in its effects than the bulk purchase.

(d) If any of the three concessions mentioned above were offered to the Cubans it would be in return for substantial new tariff concessions by Cuba in favour of Canadian products, if possible, products of the Maritime Provinces. In other words we would not offer a concession merely to induce the Cubans to maintain the status quo.

9. The conclusions of the Interdepartmental Committee seem to be acceptable from the point of view of this Department.[2]

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for McKinnon, GATT Delegation, Torquay, from Abbott, Begins: Reference your No. 280, February 2nd.†

1. It is desirable to try to find a solution which will avoid, if at all possible, a tariff war with Cuba. We have considered implications of an offer to Cuba under which Canada would undertake bulk purchase of world sugar (non Empire) of 100,000, repeat one hundred thousand tons, in each of next three years, or grant a tariff quota for the same amount. Owing to administrative features involved the choice between these two alternatives must be at our option. You might explore with the United Kingdom, BWI and Cuba whether in the circumstances this proposal offers the possibility of agreement with the parties concerned. You should discuss proposal with these parties in the order you consider advisable.

2. If acquiescence from parties affected cannot be obtained we would wish to reconsider our position since we do not envisage a situation where denunciation of existing preferential agreements is involved.

3. You should explore also, as alternative, possibility of shifting discussion of this matter into arena of International Sugar Council, since from many points of view problems involved can more appropriately be dealt with through machinery of an international commodity agreement. Ends.

RESTRICTED. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Abbott from McKinnon, Begins: Re your GATDEL No. 3 of February 10, 1951. Since its arrival on the 13 instant we have carried on exploratory talks with the Cubans necessarily feeling them out on both alternatives but without committing ourselves to either, or to quantities. Resulting from yesterday's meeting we can now state definitely that the Cuban position is that they want to negotiate on the basis of an allocated, repeat allocated, bulk purchase. Since they are firm on this point we cannot profitably pursue discussions until informed (a) if government is prepared to use bulk purchase device, and (b) if so, is prepared to contemplate allocation. Relevant consideration for you apart from matter of mechanics is that other important non-preferential suppliers may later similarly seek allocation. In the interests of our commercial relations with such suppliers and the principles of GATT any such representations could not be ignored.

2. Following definite advice as to Cuban preference re method we held exploratory talk with special representative of colonial office sent from London for purpose. As we had expected we found him greatly perturbed at prospect of any deal but emphatically favouring bulk purchase over tariff quota, which latter we warned was still alternative possibility. This dislike of tariff quota method undoubtedly would hold with other Commonwealth producers, none of whom as yet we have consulted.

3. Colonial office representative confirmed in general Cuban statement already reported to you that United Kingdom is giving consideration to large bulk purchase of Cuban raws. He revealed also that their firm hope and expectation had been that higher priced preferential raws would continue to supply entire Canadian requirements.

4. Since Cuban emphasis on allocation will continue regardless of technique to be followed, we would appreciate urgent reply.

TELEGRAM 384 Ottawa, March 1, 1951

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for McKinnon from Abbott, Begins: Re your No. 433 of February 21, 1951.

1. You are authorized to negotiate with the Cubans on the basis of a Canadian bulk purchase of one hundred thousand tons of non-preference raw sugar. For your own information, we have in mind purchase by Canadian Commercial Corporation which would act as agent for government and which would re-sell to refiners. Undertaking in any agreement would be directly by Canadian Government.

2. Regarding question of allocation we agree with your view that we could not (repeat not) properly avoid, under provisions of GATT, allocation to other non-preference suppliers on non-discriminatory basis if requested. Consequently you should press Cubans to accept proposal for bulk purchase of one hundred thousand tons of non-preference raw sugar at world prices in which case lowest cost source would get the business. This would be most fully in accord with principles and spirit of GATT. If agreement cannot be reached on this basis you might explore as a secondary alternative an undertaking to divide purchases between Cuba and Dominican Republic (other supplies inconsequential) in proportion of historical shares in Canadian market, but such purchases would have to be at world competitive prices. Obviously, we cannot give firm undertaking to purchase when there is no firm undertaking to supply and no commitment from suppliers regarding prices.

3. Respective historical shares of Cuba and Dominican Republic in Canadian market would appear to be approximately sixty per cent Cuba and forty per cent Dominican on basis of average of five prewar years and five post-war years. If post-war years only are taken Dominican share would be even higher.

4. I assume that if agreement can be reached with Cuba on bulk purchase proposal it would make it possible not only to avoid tariff war with Cuba but to secure some further concessions for Canadian exports by way of some reduction of United States preferences or reduced duty. This is needed to help justify here special bulk purchase arrangement. Ends.

RESTRICTED

Following from McKinnon to Abbott, Begins: Further re your No. 384 of March 1st. After numerous meetings our negotiations with Cuba have broken down. We have refused to consider an allocated quota as involving difficulties government would find almost insuperable. They will proceed to basis of unallocated but refuse if same is restricted to global amount authorized in yours under reference. It is obvious that their tactic is to inflate global to point where Cuban share even though unallocated would be about your present global figure. Our unwillingness to recommend enlargement of latter is due to our considered opinion that anything in nature of appreciable tariff concessions would not, repeat not, be forthcoming in any event. Cuban delegation has now notified officially further withdrawals under Article 28 comprising major portion of Geneva schedule. This situation will not be cleared up by yielding to Cuban blackmail at this (point?) and delegation's position will not change unless we receive specific instructions to the contrary. Ends.

TELEGRAM 9 Ottawa, March 24, 1951

RESTRICTED. IMMEDIATE.

Following for McKinnon, GATT Delegation, from Abbott.
Reference your No. 686, March 21, 1951, negotiations with Cuba. Begins: Both Mr. Howe and myself are very disturbed over the threatened breakdown in the negotiations with Cuba and over the prospect that the outcome of the Torquay discussions will be followed by a worsening of the trading position of the Maritime provinces in particular, in the Cuban market. You should therefore urgently endeavour to prevent this from happening. As you know the Maritime provinces have never been happy over the B.W.I. agreement and this dissatisfaction would be greatly reinforced if our Commonwealth sugar preference policy would now lead to a further deterioration in alternative markets. It is possible that such increased dissatisfaction, having in mind the recent further reduction for fish outlets in the

B.W.I., will place the continued operation of the existing B.W.I. agreement in jeopardy.

2. Consequently the United Kingdom also has an important interest in preventing an outcome which results in a worsened position for us. You should discuss position with the British with a view to securing their assistance so that joint bargaining power of two countries is used to bring about a result which is satisfactory to us. You should tell the British delegation that unless this is possible, you are authorized to increase Canadian offer to Cuba from one hundred thousand tons to one hundred and fifty thousand tons, which on an allocated basis would give Cuba about ninety thousand tons.

3. Clutterbuck was in to see me today to inform me of the concern of his government over the offer we have already made to Cuba. I explained to him the Canadian position along the lines of the above and told him also the substance of my instructions to you. He said he would communicate immediately with his government regarding our attitude and further proposals. Ends.

RESTRICTED. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for Abbott from McKinnon, Begins: This urgent message is sent in anticipation of immediate response by Cuban Government to sugar proposal agreed between the two delegations.

2. To make possible Cuban revalidation of Geneva schedule by closing date we must have ready to hand to their delegation a draft note affirming our agreement to purchase sugar as outlined to Deutsch by telephone yesterday and through him confirmed by you last night.

3. We proposed the text set forth in the fourth paragraph of this message. As drafted it deliberately leaves all technical details to be worked out by commercial experts in Ottawa, such as the meaning of the word purchase, the place of purchase, the question of origin, terms of purchase and so forth. At earliest possible instant we must have text approved by you for consideration by Cuban delegation prior to Torquay deadline. Draft text follows.

4. In each of the calendar years 1951, 1952 and 1953, the Government of Canada will purchase 150 million pounds avoirdupois of Cuban raw sugar on the basis of the price of sugar in the world market at the time of purchase. Details will be worked out in Ottawa by the appropriate agency of the Canadian Government in consultation with Cuba. Ends.

TELEGRAM GATDEL 14 Ottawa, March 28, 1951

RESTRICTED. IMMEDIATE.

Following for McKinnon, GATT delegation, Torquay, from Abbott.
Reference your No. 734 March 28, 1951, Cuban sugar.

1. Department of Trade and Commerce advise that Canadian undertaking to Cuba should be stated as follows: Begins: The Government of Canada will ensure the purchase at world market prices by Canadian refineries or otherwise of 150 million pounds avoirdupois of raw sugar out of supplies made available to the world market by the Cuban Government within each of the calendar years 1951, 1952 and 1953. Ends.

2. As indicated to you in a previous telegram it is intended that the purchases of Cuban sugar would be carried out by the Canadian refineries acting as agents of a Canadian Government Crown corporation. The refineries would purchase Cuban sugar in the ordinary commercial way at such times and in such amounts from time to time within each year as is in accord with commercial considerations. Adjustments in duty so as to enable the refineries to purchase Cuban sugar up to a total amount specified in the agreement would be arranged between the Canadian Government Crown corporation and the refineries. Consequently, in order to carry out the undertaking in the proposed agreement there is no need for further detailed arrangements or discussions between the Canadian and Cuban governments. Accordingly the last sentence in your paragraph four has been dropped from our text.

Note du ministre du Commerce pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Minister of Trade and Commerce to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 128-51 Ottawa, May 1, 1951

The Canadian Delegation at Torquay, having signified its acceptance of the compensation offered by Cuba for four items of relatively small importance withdrawn under Article XXVIII of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and Cuba having revalidated until January 1st, 1954 Schedule IX of Tariff Concessions granted to Canada at Geneva, the Canadian Delegation was directed to assure the Cuban Delegation that the Government of Canada will ensure the purchase in the market by Canadian refiners or otherwise of 75,000 short tons of Cuban raw sugar within each of the calendar years 1951, 1952 and 1953, out of supplies made available by Cuba to the world market. The undertaking also included that sugar so purchased should be shipped from Cuban ports, imported into and not re-exported from Canada.

The Canadian Delegation also assured the Delegation of the Dominican Republic that should other exporters of non-preferential sugars with a traditional interest in the Canadian market, including the Dominican Republic, wish to receive allocations on a comparable basis for themselves, their position under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade would be accorded careful and sympathetic consideration. At the same time it was understood that the total of all Canadian commitments in this regard would not be in excess of 150,000 short tons per year.

The immediate necessity for honouring these obligations exists only with Cuba in that no approaches with regard to 1951 sugar requirements have been made by other governments outside of the Commonwealth nor are they expected in 1951 due to other existing arrangements for disposal of present crops.

From initial discussion with Canadian sugar refiners, it is understood that they will readily co-operate by purchasing 75,000 short tons of their total annual requirements for domestic consumption for the three years affected, provided that by remission of duty the landed cost of these purchases at the refineries will be so adjusted as to equalize it with what the landed cost of Commonwealth raw sugar would be for the same date of purchase.

Authority is necessary formally to advise the Canadian refiners of this undertaking to equalize the landed cost of Cuban with that of Commonwealth raw sugar. In view of their existing commitments for the purchase of Commonwealth raws, which already extend to the month of August, and in view of the upward trend of sugar prices, it is important to establish the basis for the purchase of Cuban as quickly as possible.

It is intended that a statement covering each importation, indicating the amount of duty remission necessary, will be certified by the Sugar Adviser to the Department of Trade and Commerce before presentation to the Department of National Revenue. These statements will be subject to audit.[3]
